The particular losses in each presidential term being also desired by the resolution they have been ascertained; and as they furnish a striking solution of some of the general causes of those losses, the periods in which the largest and some of the smallest ones happened among each class of public agents might be usefully designated here. Among the banks the largest losses were from 1813 to 1817 then consisting entirely of depreciation on notes taken, and next from 1821 to 1824, consisting then chiefly of deposits; while from 1829 to 1833 and from 1833 to 1837 they were smaller than in any period since 1813. Among disbursing officers, looking to the amount disbursed, the largest losses were from 1821 to 1825, next from 1817 to 1821, and next from 1809 to 1813; and they were smaller from 1829 to 1833 and from 1833 to 1837 than in any other term whatever, except from 1789 to 1793.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Pennsylvania is calling attention to some errors at the Treasury Department. I desire to ask him if he has noticed some of the errors in the statements of Mr. Tilden, the nominee of the democratic party. He states the amount of the out flow of gold from this country for a series of years, but omits to deduct what has flowed in, making a difference from the true statement of $200,000,000?

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator has taken the floor and interjected a speech without asking my leave.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asked the Senator from Pennsylvania if he yielded to the Senator from Vermont. Does he yield?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. WALLACE. I will only say that, following the example of the other Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] I am making a political speech, and I trust I shall not be again interrupted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the other Senator from Vermont yielded to interruptions continually.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator from Vermont is a much older settler here than the Senator from Pennsylvania. When he gets to be as old in this Hall as the Senator from Vermont he will yield as often as the Senator.

Mr. MORRILL. I only desired to call attention to two errors, the one in regard to the outflow of gold and the other in regard to taxes amounting to from four hundred to five hundred millions.

Mr. WALLACE. I decline to yield. I continue to read from the report of Mr. Secretary Woodbury.

The loss on each $100 from 1829 to 1833 was only nineteen cents, and from 1833 to 1837 only twenty-six cents, while in some previous terms it was as high as $2 16. In this class the most numerous losses compared with all in office were from 1817 to 1821, next from 1821 to 1825, and next from 1813 to 1817. The smallest proportion in this respect, except during the first two terms under the Constitution, was from 1829 to 1833, and except those and the third term the next smallest was from 1833 to 1837.

Among collecting officers, if looking to the amounts collected, the highest losses were from 1797 to 1801, next from 1809 to 1813, next from 1817 to 1821, and next from 1805 to 1809. The most numerous defaults, compared with the whole number of that class in office, were from 1809 to 1813, next from 1805 to 1809, next from 1821 to 1825, next from 1817 to 1821, and next from 1825 to 1828. The ratio of them from 1829 to 1833 and 1833 to 1837 was not one-fourth as large as in some of the periods just enumerated. Indeed it was less than in any previous terms from the foundation of the Government except four, and the number of such defaulters was less than in any presidential term since 1804.

Mr. President, I might stop here and treat this veracious statement from the Treasury Department without signature as a discredited witness, but because the printed records give us no specific data with which to meet its falsity as to subsequent dates, I take it up as a whole and contrast it with such records as I can find on the subject and ask that reason and sense shall guide us to the truth.

It seems that the aggregate loss by the statement published between 1834 and 1861 is $15,269,000. This is too large; the Senator admits it himself. It contains discrepancies with the figures that I have alredy read. If those four years are a test, it is $7,000,000 too large. The whole sum of the losses for forty-eight years is less than $7,000,000, as shown by this statement of Secretary Woodbury. The actual losses by death and hopeless insolvency are shown by Mr. Solicitor Streeter on the 25th of October, 1856, to be $7,822,418. The defalcation shown by the books of the Treasury may have been larger, but those actually chargeable to profit and loss are stated by Mr. Streeter, as Solicitor of the Treasury, up to that date. This included debts in judgment for many years. It excluded all of which any hope remained for collection. This statement plainly contradicts the Treasury figures. He reports the ascertained insolvents up to October 25, 1856, and the statement of the Senator brought from the Treasury comes up to 1860.

Report of ascertained insolvents up to October 25, 1856, as per report of F. B. Streeter, Solicitor of the Treasury.

Debts originating in Navy Department	$1,405,631 55
Debts originating in War Department	2,942,153 71
Debts originating in customs	570,393 16
Debts originating in foreign intercourse	24,360 84
Debts originating in Indians	89,490 40
Debts originating in lands	290,627 13
Debts originating in miscellaneous accounts	890,688 90
	6,213,345 69
Balances due from banks, unavailable	1,609,072 32
Total losses	7,822,418 01

Treating these figures as the actual losses down to July, 1856, we will follow the suits of the Government to 1859 through the reports of the Treasury in order to learn the aggregate losses to that date and ascertain if we can if the data given us are true. By them we learn that suits for $4,100,000 were brought, that $2,030,000 thereof were collected, and $2,057,000 uncollected. If we add this latter sum to the lost debts, we find the whole loss to be $9,880,000 and not $15,260,000. These figures expressly contradict this statement, so that there is no possible escape.

This brings us to the conclusion irresistibly that the figures from 1834 to 1859 are not the real sums of the losses. But, for the sake of the argument, let us assume that this statement of losses from the the Treasury is correct, its figures are true, its conclusions are justly drawn. Then let us glance at the results that follow. If this veracious paper be literally true, we find that the greatest total loss shown by the statement through receiving officers from 1861 to 1875 was $4,348,000; from disbursing officers, $9,905,000. In fourteen years the total loss was $14,253,000; annual loss, $1,018,000. Loss through receiving officers from January, 1834, to June 30, 1861, $2,907,000; through disbursing officers from January 1, 1834, to June 30, 1861, $12,361,000. Total loss in twenty-seven and a half years, $15,260,000; an annual loss of $555,255.

Taking the figures of the Treasury statement itself, it shows a loss of a million annually, while during the twenty-seven and a half years preceding there there was a loss of something over half a million annually. A loss of but a million annually—a trifle, a mere bagatelle; officials take but fourteen and a quarter millions in fourteen years, hence our economy is plain. The people are suffering and our expenses are increasing, hence our economy is plain. This is the logic of the argument and of the document I am commenting on.

Where have the losses occurred that this total gives as the aggregate thereof from 1861 to 1875? By report made to the House in 1874 we find that one hundred and fifty-seven paymasters in the Army are in arrears $768,706. From the report of the Naval Committee of the House we learn that one hundred and twelve paymasters in the Navy are in arrears $1,154,000. From the unprinted document we find that one hundred and forty-eight collectors of internal revenue are in arrears about $3,600,000; and that out of four hundred and ninety-five defaulters in the Indian service these papers show two hundred and seventy-seven in the past fifteen years, and but two hundred and eighteen in the thirty years preceding. From the letter of Mr. Pratt, Commissioner of the Internal Revenue, we learn that of cash deficiencies of collectors of internal revenue between March 1, 1869, and February 28, 1876, there are $592,751.

The statement that I have referred to is contradicted by the facts; leading Senators challenge the data and refuse to permit that data to be printed. Common sense and the rule of practice in ordinary affairs certify it not to be true, and the conclusions are irresistible that the figures given as the losses from 1834 to 1859 are not the sum of the losses sustained by the Government during those years, but are overstated. The unprinted document being untruthful, the data based upon it is necessarily false and the results deduced therefrom are without support in fact; but this table and these figures have gone to the country. Three leading members of the republican party have accepted and indorsed the statement, and it and their speeches are being sent broadcast over the land under the franks of members of Congress. How untruthful it is let us see further.

It states the receipts of the Government, after leaving out the war, since July 1, 1865, at $8,039,184,922, and the disbursements at $7,909,434,948; making a total of receipts and disbursements since the 1st of July, 1865, of $16,048,520,870. The mind of the ordinary man is not more bewildered at the attempt to grasp the magnitude of the proportions of $16,148,520,870 than it is amazed at the cool audacity which will parade these figures as the aggregate receipts and disbursements of the Government during a period of ten years of peace, and attempt to build thereon a superstructure of argument for an intelligent people. Excluding from the calculation everything but the actual expenditures of the Government, and ascertaining by the data given us by the Senator from Indiana the sum-total of the losses for ten years, from July 1, 1865, as well on account of receipts as of disbursements, we find that those actual expenses have been $2,077,573,973; that the aggregate sum of the losses has been $7,145,786; the average annual expenditures, $207,757,397; the average annual loss, $714,578; and the loss per $1,000 of expenditure $3.43 in the ten years.

I have the figures and the ratio of loss for the ten years ending June 30, 1875, tabulated, which I will not detain the Senate to read.

For these ten years the Senator from Indiana says the ratio was in Johnson's administration forty-eight cents; in Grant's first administration forty cents, and in the last three years of Grant's administration twenty-six cents on the $1,000; while we find it to be an average of $3.43 on the $1,000.

Let the people judge between us.

Now, Mr. President, I am done with this statement. Let what I have said on the subject and the references that I have given go to the country side by side with the statements and the speeches that have been made based upon it, and let an intelligent people judge between them as to their truth.

But if it all be true, how does it affect the question that is before us now? How do these figures help to give relief from business depression or in the reduction of taxation? How do they aid to give cheap government, honest government? These are the issues of the present hour, and no tirades on the past, or its corruption, or its figures of expenditures, or on sporadic grievances in isolated localities will divert the minds of the people from these, the real, the grave, the vital issues of the pending campaign. They who administered the Government in those days were tried before the great tribunal of the people, and in obedience to the law of our being, both natural and political, the safety-valve of the Republic, the only protection in a government of law when it is maladministered, the remedy of change, they were driven from the seats of power.

The issues of the present and of the recent past as they affect the people now and in the future are here. They confront you now and here. They are the issues that impend before the people and they are to be answered. It is not for you to arraign the past, but it is for you to answer for the present. Why do the people cry for bread? Why do they demand employment? Why are they found in thousands throughout all this broad land seeking employment, hunting bread for their children and their wives? Why are our manufactures destroyed, our business men bankrupted? Whence comes this universal distrust of those who rule? Why is it that the people in every part of this broad land distrust those who rule? Is your administration of the Government an honest one, is it a just one, is it a cheap one? Is your financial policy a wise one? These and kindred questions press now upon the people, and the people will have them answered. Those who suffer and who see those whom they love suffer, think deeply, think seriously, think earnestly. The people suffer and they think.

Why have the expenses of the Government increased since 1872? I speak now from official figures. The whole sum expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, was $270,559,695. The whole sum expended for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, was $274,623,392. The increase was $4,063,697. The decrease on account of interest on the public debt, included in both items, was $14,264,295, and the gross increase was $18,327,992. Deduct increase in pension and Indian appropriations from 1872 to 1875, $3,245,745, making an actual increase of expenses from 1872 to 1875, for civil service, War and Navy Departments alone, of $15,082,247.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator allow me to correct him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania decline to yield?

Mr. WALLACE. I cannot yield. I have already stated that I decline to be interrupted. The Senator can make his speech after I get through.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no speech to make, but I should like to have the Senator correct.

Mr. WALLACE. In those years the civil service increased from $60,984,757 to $69,100,884, making an increase of the civil service from 1872 to 1875 of $8,116,127.

The civil service cost the people in the fiscal year ending June 30—

1872	60, 984, 757
1875	69, 100, 884

Showing a gradual increase since the war, until by the last report it reaches $17,990,859 more than in 1867.

Mr. President, here is the plain proof that your expenses are increasing and your Government becoming more costly. You profess your desire to retrench. You cannot retrench if you would. Those who create abuses in governmental administration or suffer the necessities of their political being to press them forward and thus increase expenses can never reform them. It is as true an axiom in political theory as anything that exists therein, that those who create increased expenses or wrongs in administration can never reform them. The momentum of party organization, the hordes of needy retainers and the demands of officials who manipulate the primaries control and direct official action. You are in the groove of party and party necessity and you cannot get out if you would. The only remedy is the lever of change applied by the people.

Is your financial policy a wise one, or is it a fruitful cause of our present ills? Can a policy which has created and nourished a system by which $48,000 in gold in February, 1865, has in eleven years produced $112,000 in dividends and now aggregates $108,000 in surplus and other outstanding profits in addition, and under which the owners thereof can now go into the market with their $100,000 of bonds bought for $48,000 in gold in 1865 and sell them for $126,000, be anything else but a cause of distress and disaster?

Yet this is the record of a part of your system, and it is not an isolated case. I take eighteen cases of a similar character distributed through the State in which I live, not old organizations with their accretions, but new organizations dating from June, 1863, to March, 1865, and here again I speak by official figures. I have the data from the Comptroller of the Treasury in regard to what I say under date not earlier than the 1st of July. These organizations date from June, 1863, to March, 1865, when the greenback dollar was ranging from forty-two to seventy-six, averaging about sixty-five cents in gold. With a capital of $2,800,000 these eighteen institutions have deposited bonds to the amount of $2,819,000. Their dividends to July 1, 1876, are $3,851,455. Their surplus and other profits are $1,866,751, and the total dividends and surplus in twelve years on $2,800,000 is $5,718,204.

If the bonds that they deposited are sixes of 1881, they can go into the market to-day with the $2,819,000 of bonds costing in gold in 1863 and 1864 $1,832,350, and they can sell them for $3,551,940 in legal-tenders. Thus the investment of $1,832,350 in gold yields $7,437,794, or more than 400 per cent. in twelve years. In these figures are found the traces of the ruin of manufactures, of merchants, of business men of every class. The system that permits such results is bad and only bad continually; the legislation that fosters, that produces, or that permits such a condition of things needs correction and amendment. That legislation lies at your door; it is not ours.

This is but one of the evils of this financial policy. It should be corrected by recognizing the existence of other powers and other interests than aggregated wealth. The time has come in this country when something else than aggregated wealth is to be recognized as the power of the country. There are men of brains and muscle, living, breathing men of this country in other vocations who have rights as well as those who represent aggregated wealth. The time has come for the pendulum to swing in the other direction, and those in power will mark well the query as to whether the hour has not struck now.

Is the country to tread remorselessly under the lead of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] the path to specie payment without preparation? Since July 1, 1865, we have expended for administration and paid debt amounting to $3,861,502,508. This is equal to the debt of Great Britain. No more exhaustive labor was ever imposed upon any people. Is it strange that we are distressed, exhausted, and poor? Is it the part of wisdom to continue this destructive process or shall we make haste slowly in our march to specie payments? Is there to be no time to breathe? Is it strange that the people grow restive? Are there to be no moments of rest for those who have saved as well the faith as the unity of the Republic? Is this generation to be forced into bankruptcy in order that the next may be freed from debt? No wise government will do so for such an idea. It is the path of prudence to postpone resumption until the people are rested from the exhaustive processes of the past ten years, from the financial distress of the past three years, and until by natural and steady growth of confidence and business resumption will come with ease and with safety. This is no question of inflation. It is simply a question of the removal of a standing menace from the business men of the country, the removal of an appalling shadow which they believe, whether rightly or wrongly, is the cause of their present trouble. It is no question of hard money or soft money. The people I represent on this floor believe in paying their debts in honest money, in coin. And, sir, my vote will never be found here recorded either for the inflation of the currency to the extent of one dollar or for anything else than the honest payment of the public debt in coin. But, sir, they ask with the earnestness of an honest people, where are the evidences of your ability to pay your notes? Where are the signs of preparation for resumption? Is it the news that comes to us from the East but recently in which the A. W. Sprague & Co. mills are shut down and eight or nine thousand employés turned loose upon the world? See the picture in my own State. The thriving mechanic or laborer who but three years since bought his lot and built his house, paid upon them the half and gave his mortgage for the balance, finds that under this policy his house and his lot both go to pay the mortgage; the hard earnings of all his years are swept away to increase the value of the Government's obligations, which flows from the shrinking of the value of real estate and the swelling of the value of those obligations under your system of legislation, and his wife and children are to be turned homeless upon the world.

The enterprising man of business too, the man who is between capital and labor with his hand upon both, the scheming, active, energetic man, the middle class in this country, upon whom all of its future depends, the live, energetic, business man with an intelligent brain, a cunning hand, and an industrious body, this man having but a small capital, hires money from the capitalists to conduct his business, and he, too, under the operations of this system sees himself unable to meet that which he has agreed to pay, and he, too, must go to the wall. Property decreases in value on every side. Money and moneyed securities appreciate as the threat continues; men grow suspicious; values are unsettled in every direction; sheriffs' sales increase; bankrupt merchants are found in every calling; the shadow of self-murder falls upon the path of many. Your legislation in the interest of aggregated wealth and against the business man has given us this condition of things. Since the use of a mixed currency there has never been an hour when all the paper obligations of the country could be redeemed in coin. Credit and confidence were as essential as the modicum of gold that was at its root. Can credit and confidence ever come while values fall and business men quake and capitalists refuse to lend? To steady values and stay panics we must not only provide specie, but we must bring the public mind to the conclusion that they do not need it. Can such a condition of things ever come while the shadow of enforced resumption without preparation appalls them with its unknown terrors? Sir, Pennsylvania, pointing to her record—and I speak for the vast majority of her people; I am as conscious of it as I am that I am here—Pennsylvania, pointing to her past record, her sacrifices, and her suffering, to her prostrated industries, to her manufactories closed, to her mines abandoned, to her factories untenanted, to her iron unsold, to her coal in heaps, to her lumber in piles, to her tens of thousands of unemployed men, artisans, laborers, and miners scattered all over that broad State; Pennsylvania, that great Commonwealth, here and now recognizing her obligation to pay her debt to the utmost farthing in coin—Pennsylvania and her people ask for time, for preparation, for an easier road to resumption.

Why do the people distrust those who rule? Is your administration of the Government an honest one in their view? It is for you to answer? Are the people justified in their belief that we have had an administration of the Government that has discarded statesmanship and sought inexperience, that has ignored integrity in official trust and patronized the corrupted and the vile, that has permitted wealth to be gathered from meager salaries, that has tolerated the jobber and the speculator on the threshold of the White House, that has reversed the philosophy of the Trojan who feared the Greeks and those bearing gifts, that has held complicity with gold-gambling and nurtured and petted a whisky ring, stolidly winked at corrupt practices in the custom-houses, disgraced the country in the San Domingo and the Secor business, lost an Attorney-General who resigned pending charges of misuse of the public money, a Secretary of the Interior by unrefuted charges of corruption in his Department, a Secretary of the Treasury forced from his place by public indignation, a Postmaster-General whose method and record were unsatisfactory to a discriminating people, a Secretary of War whose trial for bribery has just been concluded, and a minister to Great Britain whose methods a unanimous committee declared to be improper and unjustifiable? Are the people justified in this belief? Are they right or are they wrong when they ask with impressive earnestness, Has not the rule of official accountability been held for naught, and have not positions of honor and of trust been made the bauble and the gift of personal preference, and capacity and honesty been among the last qualifications required? Have we not had bribery in the War Office? Are there not charges of swindling of pensioners, and of plundering in mail-lettings and in surveys of the public lands, of bribery at elections, of black-mailing of merchants, of conspiracies to cheat justice and acquit burglars, of disgrace in diplomacy and personal misgovernment? Are these charge not true? If the people be deceived in regard to these charges, if they be not true, give them the proofs and they will acquit you; give them the proofs, and they will not hold you responsible; but these issues are those to which the people at the present hour seem to apply their attention. They are the vital points, the pith and marrow of the struggle. If they are true, have they been indorsed? The seventeenth resolution at Cincinnati reads thus:

> The national administration merits commendation for its honorable work in the management of our domestic and foreign affairs, and President Grant deserves the continued and hearty gratitude of the American people for his patriotism and his immense services in war and peace.

I make no assertion that these charges are proved; I say they are in existence. They are for you to answer, and you have indorsed the Administration under which the people believe them to have been in existence. If these be not true, it is for you to show their untruth. It is very plain that the issues sought to be made to-day in this Chamber are not those to which I have endeavored to call attention. The issue that you seek to manufacture relates to the South. Your issue is to be based upon the misdeeds of the southern people. It is not the questions of cheap government, of honest government, of a sound financial policy; but it is solely on the outrages you claim have been perpetrated by the southern people that you seek to have the issue fought. We have had this in the speeches of the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Vermont, and the Senator from Indiana. We ask you, is your administration of the Government a cheap one? Let the increased expenses found in your annual Treasury reports answer that question. Is your financial policy a sound one? Let the condition of the business people of the country answer that question. Is your administration of the Government an honest one? Let the records of the past seven years and the belief in the minds of the people themselves answer that question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, before I proceed with what I intended to say to-night, I wish to refer very briefly to one or two points made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.] I express my profound regret that the Senator has deemed it his duty to make the closing paragraphs of his speech. His quiet, kind, and I may say gentle way with us led me to form the impression that he would not do injustice to any one, and especially would not arraign the President of the United States and men high in authority on nameless charges and innuendoes. And now he says he makes no charge. He makes innuendoes, he repeats the common garbage of the street, the same kind of garbage that was published to defame the memory of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and would have driven any man but Jackson to his grave, that haunted the life of every man who has had the misfortune to be President of the United States. He makes no charge. He repeats these baseless innuendoes and then says, "come forward with your proofs and disprove them." Is that the way in which a man and an administration and a cause are to be tried here? I believe my honorable friend from Pennsylvania will regret the closing paragraphs of his speech. The rest of the speech is political. He says so himself, and it was political if to be political is to be harsh and unjust; but he will find that it is not politic, because in politics a man must never exaggerate; he must lay down the line and plummet and pursue the mark of unbending truth.

Now, Mr. President, there were two statements made by the Senator from Pennsylvania that shocked me at once. He says that the republican party and my friend from Indiana, who is not here, put upon your record a statement that was not signed, that had no mark of official authority, that was published to the world, and is false. If I understood him correctly, that was the charge. Now upon the files of the Secretary, when he spoke and when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] offered a printed statement showing the percentage of losses by defalcations during all the Administrations since 1834, there is and was an official document which accompanied the statements called for, and among which was the table read by the Senator from Indiana, and this document is signed "B. H. Bristow, Secretary of the Treasury." I will read the closing paragraph. After calling attention to the long list furnished, he says:

In reply I have to transmit herewith the statement of balances called for, also a recapitulation showing the amount of such losses, also the amount of the receipts and disbursements of the Government for the same period and the ratio of losses per $1,000 to the aggregate received and disbursed, arranged as nearly as practicable in periods of four years each; also a statement showing, as far as known to this Department, the stocks held by the United States in trust or to secure moneys paid; as called for by the terms of the resolution.

There is his sign-manual, known I suppose to every Senator on this floor. This paper now belongs to the files of the Senate, and I produce it here. That recapitulation, as it is called, is a true statement taken from the records of the Treasury Department, and it is fortified by names to the last cent; and because we did not desire to print these names, which no doubt would do injury to many living and to the dead, therefore the statement which accompanied that list is to be denounced as having no official signature, no official sanction, and being false. I show you the official signature of Benjamin H. Bristow, a gentleman who at least has never been dishonored by falsehood, and this is the official document, the correctness of which is disputed in a political speech.

Then, in order to show that there had been large defalcations in the internal-revenue service, the Senator produced the old, stale story that I have myself three times during this session met by the official denial; and that is that a certain statement often made on the stump that official defalcations in the collection of internal revenue amounted to over $20,000,000, when the paper itself upon its face over the signature of R. W. Tayler, Comptroller, shows that it is not a statement of defalcations, but it is a statement of uncollected balances due from the people of the United States to collectors of internal revenue whose accounts are in process of settlement; and here is the document. It has been several times referred to. We also have the official statements since that time that the actual loss or defalcation on collections by collectors of internal revenue was something less than $2,000,000; the precise amount I have not now before me. All I can say as to these most striking statements made by the Senator is that if the rest of his figures are as wild as these the people of Pennsylvania will find it out before the election, and, instead of its being political, it will be a very bad document for my honorable friend. I will allude after a while to the statement in which he gives us credit for paying $3,891,000,000 interest and principal of the public debt. I pass that, however, for the present because that was the wildest statement of all.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator will observe that I said the payments on account of the expenses of the Government and the debt since 1865.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not so understand the Senator, but I give him the benefit of his correction. Before I get through I will give the exact amount collected during the time referred to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator from Ohio refer to the last-named document by its number, so that it may go in his speech?

Mr. SHERMAN. Executive Document No. 140, third session Forty-first Congress. It has been referred to before.

Now, Mr. President, this resolution has given rise to an extensive political debate, and in the course of that debate more than one Senator has referred to the democratic platform and to the commentary upon that platform by Governor Tilden, the candidate for President on the democratic ticket. Now, sir, I propose to subject this democratic platform and the commentary of Governor Tilden to some criticism; and in order that I may not do injustice, in order that I may not exaggerate and go beyond the bounds of reason, beyond the bounds of strict fact, I will have in the course of my remarks every paragraph of this platform and all that is material in the letter of Governor Tilden which bears on our currency and our public debt read to the Senate, and then I will test the promises and pretenses in this platform and in this letter by the actual facts and conduct of the democratic party.

Sir, neither an individual nor a party is to be tested by what it promises. The greatest scoundrel that ever lived could outpromise the most honest man that ever lived. It is the conduct and acts of a party, as well as the conduct and acts of an individual, that give it character, and it is the acts and tendencies of the party that will lead the people of the United States to decide whether or not this party can be restored now safely to power, and not the mere empty promises of a platform. My friend from Pennsylvania used one phrase that I thought was very well. He said the republican party was in the grooves, in the ruts; it was impelled by party necessity. I want to show what have been the grooves and the ruts and the party necessities of the democratic party by sober facts and figures; and, in order that I may not seek to go back and blacken the democratic party by what occurred during the war, I intend to confine myself mainly to that which relates to our currency and to our debt, and to show you here upon the record what has been the course of the democratic party upon the very topics embraced in the financial promises of this platform.

Mr. President, what is this platform? The first paragraph which relates to the subject now before us is a very brief one. It is in pursuance of the purpose which dictated this party platform of sounding often and long the word "reform." After acquiescing in all the great things we have done in the memorable disputes between the republican and democratic parties, they demand reform, and they go on to say:

Reform is necessary to establish a sound currency, restore the public credit, and maintain the national honor.

"To establish a sound currency." Who established the present currency composed of United States notes and national-bank notes? The republican party, against the vote of nearly every democrat in both Houses of Congress. The United States notes were established by the act of February 25, 1862, and but two democratic Senators voted for it and they were wreathed with immortal honor from that moment. The national-bank act was passed here by a pretty close vote, not a single democrat voting for it. All our national-currency laws were republican measures, passed against the vote of nearly every democrat, and it is conceded now, not only by the people of this country of both political parties, but by the people of all nations who study the laws of currency, that we have established the best paper currency that has ever been devised by mortal man, lacking only one quality to make it perfect, and that is the capacity of being converted on the demand of the holder into gold and silver coin. Our national currency, the mode by which it is guarded, printed, surrounded, its absolute security against loss, all of these have excited the admiration of all, and earned the highest compliment from Governor Tilden for its strength and safety. How are you going to reform this system? What measure of reform do you propose about our United States notes and national currency? Do you propose in the name of reform to restore to the old State banks, with their many colored forms and various and changing value? Lay not you hands on this system except in the way of advancing the notes to par in gold and silver, which I will come to presently.

But they talk about "restoring the public credit." Restoring the public credit! When was the public credit higher than it is this day? How was it when the democratic party went out of power, when our bonds were sold at 11 per cent. discount——

Mr. BOUTWELL. Fifteen.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir, 15 per cent. discount; and they actually paid 10 per cent. interest to get money enough to carry on the ordinary operations of the Government.

Mr. CONKLING. Twelve per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Twelve per cent. was it? I always want to keep within the line, and I will not exaggerate knowingly. But, sir, they talk about restoring the public credit. All our bonds to-day are worth more than par in gold in the money markets of the world. We are now offered money, gold, upon our bonds at 4½ per cent.; and the House of Representatives refuse to give the Secretary of the Treasury the power to sell a 4½ per cent. bond of a particular description in order to accomplish the great reduction of 1½ per cent. interest on nine hundred and eighty-five millions of bonds now bearing 6 per cent. interest. We early in this session, without a party division, by the unanimous vote of the Senate, my democratic associates joining with us, passed a bill to make some change in the funding law so that we might negotiate 4½ per cent. bonds at par in gold. We could have done it in April last, but the House refused to do it, or have neglected thus far to do it. Restore our credit! Our credit is second only to that of Great Britain among all the nations of the world, and Great Britain is a nation of unexampled wealth, drawing to her stores and supplies from every country in the world. But, sir, to-day the bonds of the United States are worth more than those of Germany or France, or any other country only save Great Britain.

And now, forsooth, we are to bring the democratic party back to restore our public credit!

What is the next thing they are going to do in the way of reform? To maintain the national honor! When before was the national honor more highly advanced than it is at this moment? Who has upheld the national honor in the field of battle and in foreign courts, at home and abroad, in war and in peace? In 1869 when a dangerous controversy as to the construction of our bonds sprang up, who was it that upheld the national honor? The republican party against the vote of every member of the democratic party in the Senate, as I will show you in another connection. We, forsooth, are to restore the democratic party in order to preserve the national honor!

What is the next paragraph in this platform?

We denounce the failure for all these eleven years to make good the promise of the legal-tender notes, which are a changing standard of value in the hands of the people, and the non-payment of which is a disregard of the plighted faith of the nation.

We are charged with the failure of advancing our notes toward par in gold, or advancing them at all. Now let us see what is the history of these notes. During the war, when the republican party was conducting the administration and was struggling against adversaries which almost endangered and overthrew our Government, our credit did fall down and our notes fell with it, until it was true at one time, in the darkest hours, that $48,000 of gold would, to use the case put by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE,] have bought $110,000 of paper money. Was that our fault? Are we responsible for that? No, sir; and at the close of the war our notes were still so far depreciated that they sold in 1865 for from 48 cents to 68 cents in gold. What, then, did the republican party do to advance these notes to gold? By an almost unanimous vote of both Houses we passed a resolution declaring that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McCulloch, should proceed to fund the floating debt and contract the greenbacks, and thus march toward specie payments. That process was arrested by a strong popular feeling that grew up after it had been in operation about eighteen months—so strong that in this Senate every democrat voted to stop that contraction. In the House I believe every democrat voted for it, and every republican in the Senate also voted to stop that contraction except four, two from New England and two from the State of New York. I was one of those who voted to arrest, for the time, the contraction of the currency. If we caused a check of our progress toward specie payments, I share with others and all the democrats in both Houses must share in that responsibility. But still we did pursue the steady policy of funding all the floating indebtedness and carried it out, so that in 1869 our notes had been advanced to 76 cents in gold. What was done then? Then the question came up how to strengthen the public credit, how we should advance our notes still further toward the coin standard; and the republican party, after a long debate, in March, 1869, introduced and passed the bill called the "bill to strengthen the public credit." Who did that? Where were my democratic friends then? Where was this party that now denounces us with political crime because for eleven years we have not advanced to a specie standard? There and then was the opportunity which removed the last doubt upon the United States notes and the bonds. The questions that then clouded our credit were, first, whether or not the bonds might not be paid in greenbacks; and second, whether we intended to pay the greenbacks in coin, or intended to let them drift along, supported alone on the uneasy wave of public credit. We settled those questions by the "act to strengthen the public credit," by declaring that both bonds and notes should be payable in coin. This act plainly tended to advance our public credit and the value of the legal-tender notes. Where were our democratic friends then? I have here the vote. The vote in the Senate was 42 in the affirmative and 13 in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry, Fessenden, Gilbert, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill, Nye, Patterson, Pool, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sawyer, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Warner, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—42.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Carpenter, Casserly, Cole, Davis, Morton, Osborn, Rice, Ross, Spencer, Stockton, Thurman, and Vickers—13.

There is not a single democrat among the yeas, and I recognize among the nays many of the honored leaders of that party that now arraigns us for delaying for eleven long years the march toward specie payments. That act which everybody sees now was the crucial point which advanced us rapidly toward the specie standard was opposed by the whole mass of the democratic party. By the operation of that act in a single year our notes rose from seventy-six cents to eighty-eight cents in coin, so that in March, 1870, our United States notes were worth eighty-eight cents in coin. There was but one step necessary then to be taken in order to bring those notes up to par in coin, and that was some suitable measure to gradually redeem a portion of them and to maintain them at par.

Now I wish to recall to the mind of Senators what occurred in 1870. The Committee on Finance matured a bill which was brought into the Senate and debated for many days; it was called the funding bill of 1870. I have here a copy of that bill as it passed the Senate. It passed the Senate with every republican in the Senate in favor of it and every democrat in the Senate opposed to it. Before I read the provisions of that bill and show you what effect it would have had in advancing our notes to the par of gold, I call your attention to the vote. I do not wish to arraign gentlemen by name, but only give the vote as it stood. The yeas were 33, and the nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry, Fowler, Gilbert, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howell, Kellogg, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Osborn, Pomeroy, Pratt, Ramsey, Revels, Rice, Sawyer, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Warner, Williams, and Wilson—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Boreman, Buckingham, Casserly, Corbett, McCreery, McDonald, Sprague, Stockton, and Thurman—10.

Not a single democrat voted in the affirmative. Thus that bill passed this Senate March 11, 1870. It has in it the provisions now recommended by Governor Tilden himself; and yet these gentlemen, now as then the leaders of the democratic party, voted in 1870 against the very proposition that he and they now in their platform denounce us for opposing and hindering. While we voted for what he proposes now, they voted against it. Here is the bill as it passed the Senate. The first two sections were very much like the present refunding act. By the third section authority was granted to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue 4 per cent. gold bonds, "payable in coin at forty years from date;" and it contains this provision:

And such bonds may be disposed of, either in the United States or elsewhere at not less than their par value, for coin, or, at the discretion of the Secretary, for United States notes; or may be exchanged at not less than par for any of the obligations of the United States outstanding at the date of the issue of such bonds.

Here is precisely what Governor Tilden himself now recommends, and that bill went to the House, and there a united democratic vote, with the aid of a portion of the republican vote, who had then already caught the idea that more paper money would be a good thing, defeated the funding bill of the Senate, and sent us back portions of it now the law called the refunding act. And yet we are denounced by the democratic party, sanctioned by Governor Tilden, for preventing the advance of these notes to gold; for not doing what with their utmost and united strength and votes they tried to prevent us from doing.

Now let me read from another section of this funding act that was stricken out by the House. The eighth section of the bill provided—

That the amount of circulating notes which any bank may receive from the Comptroller of the Currency under the provisions of section 21 of said act may equal, but not exceed, 80 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited, but shall not exceed in the aggregate the amount to which such bank may be entitled under said section.

That is, in order further to advance the notes to par, we required instead of 90 per cent. to be issued only 80 per cent., and thus provided for a retirement of bank-notes as well. We further provided in the last section—

That as circulating notes are issued under this section an equal amount of United States notes shall be canceled and destroyed.

Mr. BOGY. That bill did not pass the House where your party had a large majority. The democrats had hardly enough members to call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. I intended to answer that. You say why did it not pass the House when the republican party had the majority? I answer that the democrats did all they could to defeat it and had aid from the republican party; but I ask you, does it lie in your mouths to arraign us because we could not do what we attempted and what you helped to prevent us from doing?

Mr. BOGY. At a proper time I can explain that the bill was injudicious, in my estimation; but the democrats had no power to prevent its passage even if it had been a good bill. Yet that bill itself I think can be shown to be injudicious.

Mr. SHERMAN. Governor Tilden now recommends the very things contained in that bill, and, because we could not carry both Houses in favor of the proposition and you aided to defeat it, we are to be arraigned by you! Well, sir, if that is what you call logic in politics, God save me from such logic. I know that the minority is not responsible for what is done, but it is responsible for what it helps to prevent and what it aids in doing. A minority should not lie back like a stubborn mule in the traces and prevent the wagon from going on. It may not lead the team, but it must do its duty. And, sir, I never heard yet in a legislative body or in any community or in any party, in a family or in a household, that, because one member has not the direction and command and control, he will therefore do nothing. A soldier, a captain, a colonel may not give an order; the general must command as the majority must in a legislative body; but must therefore the soldier and the captain and the colonel lie back and do nothing? And, worse, shall he oppose and resist and then shall he arraign the general because he could not do what these soldiers prevented? That is the position of the democratic party. And now Governor Tilden and the Saint Louis convention scold at us that for eleven years we have not advanced these notes to par in gold when they have resisted our efforts and every honest effort made in that direction.

Now I will go a little further. During all these controverted eleven years no democrat, high or low, in either House of Congress ever proposed a bill or measure that looked to resumption.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know that the Senator exactly has a right to say that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Have I not?

Mr. BAYARD. I think not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Give me a case.

Mr. BAYARD. I can. If you will go to your committee-room you will find there a measure of the most stringent resumption that you ever had in your hands, sir, and have not brought it into this Senate for the last three months, and which has the votes of the three democratic members of that committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is that bill?

Mr. BAYARD. It is about the resumption of specie payments. You are aware that since I came into this body and had a seat upon the committee of which you are chairman there never has been an act, there never has been even a measure that had a face toward speedy resumption that I have not stood firmly by from the beginning to the end. We had no control to bring measures in the Senate, and the Senator ought not to stand here and say that the democratic party have not stood, as he knows they have stood in this Senate upon his committee, in favor of the sternest measure of specie resumption.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do say that the Senator from Delaware has been from the beginning an earnest, able, and conscientious advocate of every measure toward resumption, but his party has not been.

Mr. BAYARD rose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend will not interpose. I now say again, and I will allow any gentleman to interrupt me so as to tell me the measure, show me a single measure tending to produce resumption or in that direction introduced by a democrat or by the democratic party and voted for by the democrats during these eleven years to promote and provide for specie resumption. Individual members have been faithful to their duty. My friend perhaps went a little beyond the rule in referring to what occurred in committee. The bill that he alluded to I suppose is the bill of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] is it not?

Mr. BAYARD. I referred to a fact within the Senator's own knowledge, as I think. My party was but a mere handful; when I came here we had but eight members of this body, and I was the sole democrat upon this Committee on Finance. The Senator knew what my action had been; he knew that I had represented my party; and yet in my presence he arraigns us for the failure to restore specie payments. I thought he had no right to do so, and I brought the fact back to his own knowledge, which justified me in saying what I did.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not yet exactly understand the fact the Senator alludes to. If it is the fact that we have before us a bill that tends toward specie payment, introduced by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] undoubtedly that is true; but what occurred upon that bill, I do not think I am at liberty to state or even to refer to. Leave out that fact, and the Senator will find, and I again call his attention to the point, that the bills introduced for specie resumption were by republicans. Whatever might have been his action and his individual efforts, the party with which he is associated have steadily opposed these measures. I throw out of view as entirely immaterial all the long debates we had in the session of 1873–'74 when there was a development of a great variety of opinion in both political parties. I lay that out of view and hold no man responsible for it. But the republican party did at the next session of 1874–'75 resolve that they would take some distinct and definite step toward specie resumption, and we introduced a bill for that purpose; and that bill, called the resumption bill, was voted against by every democrat in this body and in the House also.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is in error if so small a fraction as I was in that party may be considered. I did not vote against his bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Did you vote for it?

Mr. BAYARD. I did not, and I gave my reasons to the Senate. I thought it was a bill no honest man could vote for.

Mr. SHERMAN. I had forgotten that he did not vote. I think the Senator will bear me witness that I would not do him injustice for a moment. Now since he mentions it I recollect it. But every democrat who did vote, voted against it; and, if he chose to withhold the power of the State which he represents here so ably from the consideration of that question, we must still look to the balance of the leaders of the democratic party to see where their flag is.

Now I want to come to the next proposition. The fifth proposition contained in this platform is this:

> We denounce the improvidence which in eleven years of peace has taken from the people in Federal taxes thirteen times the whole amount of the legal-tender notes and squandered four times this sum in useless expense, without accumulating any reserve for their redemption.

Here we have got the democrats on a fair simple question of arithmetic. Now let us test that question. Can I be mistaken that a great party now seeking to be restored to power in this country could make a statement like this if it is not true?

I find by the tables before me that the greenbacks outstanding are $369,619,228, and I find that thirteen times that is $4,705,050,964. I have here a statement of the aggregate receipts from all sources—not from taxes alone, but from all sources—from customs, from internal revenue, from direct taxes, from premium on loans and sales of gold coin and miscellaneous items, from the first of July, 1865, until the first of July, 1876, being a period of eleven years, was $4,192,633,801. This sum includes premium on loans and sales of gold, which ought not to be considerered because it is not part of the revenue, for it is largely used and balanced by premium on bonds purchased, thus reducing the aggregate revenue to near four thousand millions; but I take the entire aggregate of all the receipts of every kind that came into the Treasury of the United States. If then we take the difference of these two sums we find that these democratic platform-makers have made a mistake in a simple question of arithmetic of $512,417,163. That is not much. My friend from Pennsylvania can beat them on figures. But still when a great party undertake to state facts and multiply and divide, they ought to give true results.

Now let us go a little further. They say we have squandered four times the amount of the greenbacks; four times the amount of the greenbacks is $1,478,476,912, or say, in round numbers, $1,500,000,000 that we have wasted and squandered. If the republican party has squandered $1,500,000,000 it deserves impeachment almost as bad as the democratic party, but not quite, for different reasons that I will not stop now to enumerate. But let us see what became of this $4,192,000,000; and here again I turn to the official documents, and these are drawn from the same official statements. I find that we have paid on the principal of the public debt between the dates named $500,252,802; interest on the public debt $1,335,344,845; we have paid on pensions $296,239,865; in all $2,131,000,000 for these three items; and that is more than one-half of the whole amount I have got to account for. And what were these items? Is the republican party responsible for these items? Are we responsible for the public debt? Are we responsible for the interest paid on that debt? Are we responsible for the pensions paid to the poor disabled solders without arms or legs, blind and wandering over our country, or their widows and their orphans?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I may interrupt my friend, for one I am obliged to say that I think we are, for if we had not been they would not have got them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not taken that view of it; but I think the common public mind of this country holds the rebels of the South responsible. Although they suffered like us, yet it was their attempt to break up this Government of ours which we were bound in honor and manhood to defend to the last gasp at whatever cost of life or treasure. I think the commonest sentiment even of our own friends at the South, late our enemies, is that they are responsible for this. They thought they were fighting in a good cause. We knew we were fighting in a good cause; and if at the expense of the loss of hundreds of thousands of our bravest men, at the loss according to the estimate of Mr. Wells of some $7,000,000,000 of treasure, at a loss of all the interest that may accumulate and all the pensions that may be paid, yet we consider the result as of priceless value beyond measure either of men or money. Thank God that by these sacrifices we have a country extending from ocean to ocean, from Maine to Louisiana, with no hostile lines crossing our plains, our rivers, our mountains—one country, one and indivisible; and I trust so will be until time shall end. For this inheritance which we have won for those who come after us we count this treasure as not lost but won.

Now, sir, I have accounted for more than half already of this large sum that we are charged with. What else? We have paid in bounty and other war claims and other expenditure of the war, which are conceded by everybody to be the direct result of the war, the amount of $453,424,048.91.

Mr. DAVIS. Between what dates?

Mr. SHERMAN. I gave the dates, July 1, 1865, and June 30, 1876.

Mr. DAVIS. Is that the same date published here?

Mr. SHERMAN. Precisely the same; and I here call the attention of my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] who I believe is not present, who complained a little about a statement sent here by Mr. Conant. I have no doubt that that statement is true upon the logical basis upon which it rests; but I prefer not to go so far, and not to charge as war losses many of the items mentioned by Mr. Conant; but I take as the basis of my statement the statement prepared mainly I think by General GARFIELD, at any rate introduced in his speech of February 24, 1875, showing the nature and character of the claims paid in two years that make up this sum of $453,424,000 paid on war expenses during the eleven years referred to, and I will read some of them.

The great body of them is the bounty claims; unpaid money due soldiers at the close of the war, and paid after June 30, 1865; prize-money due captors; collecting and drilling volunteers; pay of two and three year volunteers; defending suits for seizures of abandoned and captured property; various relief acts; payment to captors of rebel ram Albemarle; bounty for destruction of enemy's vessels; claims of loyal citizens for supplies furnished during the rebellion, and so on. Here is a formidable list that I will not repeat, because it is contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which shows you the elements upon which this computation is made.

I have also the statement of Mr. Wells, of the State of Connecticut, who became specially expert in examining questions of revenue, and he states in one of his official reports—I think it was in 1869–'70—the cost of the war, and he says that the payments made out of the current Treasury even at that time were more than one-half the expense of the National Government. I have taken none but what are deemed to be proper items to make up this sum of $452,424,048, and I have the details here by years, giving the amount each year, which I will embody in my remarks, showing the amounts of such undisputed war claims as were paid out of the current receipts of the Treasury:

War expenditures from July 1, 1865, to July 1, 1876.

Year.	Pensions.	Interest on public debt.	Miscellaneous expenditures on account of war estimates.
1866	$15,605,352 35	$133,067,741 69	$165,370,809 83
1867	20,936,551 71	143,781,591 91	51,595,174 85
1868	23,782,386 78	140,424,045 71	64,084,439 85
1869	28,476,621 78	130,694,242 80	36,162,628 49
1870	28,340,202 17	129,235,498 00	29,764,704 08

1872	28,533,402,76	117,357,839 72	22,007,124 94
1873	29,359,426 86	104,750,688 44	23,152,300 51
1874	29,038,414 66	107,119,815 21	18,012,900 63
1875	29,456,216 22	103,093,544 57	15,332,273 96
1876	28,257,395 69	100,243,271 23	12,419,012 31
Total	296,229,865 86	1,335,344,845 21	453,424,048 91

War expenditures	$2,084,998,759 98
Principal of public debt paid during eleven years above	500,252,802 59

What is the aggregate of these items?—$2,585,251,562.57. Besides those that I have deducted, I have left as still to be paid out of the ordinary run of the Treasury many claims that ought manifestly to be charged to war claims. Almost every branch of expenditure was largely swollen as the unavoidable result of the war: the vastly increased expense of collecting this large revenue, the enormous increase of our judiciary fund growing out of disturbances the direct result of the war, and various other items about which there may be some dispute. I have only taken those that are undisputed; and what is left? When we deduct these $2,585,251,562 from the $4,192,000,000 of gross receipts there is a balance of $1,607,000,000 to pay all the expenses of the Government for eleven years, Army and Navy, Congress and the civil list, judiciary and foreign intercourse, all the multiplied operations of the Government, including the purchase of Alaska, including the innumerable items that have tended to swell the expenditures since the close of the war; and yet they tell us we have squandered $1,478,000,000 out of the $1,607,000,000. That is a simple sum in arithmetic. That is the basis of gross error upon which this Saint Louis platform rests; and I say that, while a great deal is excused in political warfare, the man who framed that plank in your platform ought to be called to an account by you for a vast fabric of demonstrated falsehood.

But, sir, that is the plank that will be rung upon on all the stumps of this country. We are charged with squandering nearly all the money that is left after paying the undoubted war claims out of $1,607,000,000 out of which the expenses of the Government were paid, and I have no doubt very large sums, perhaps three hundred millions or more of this sum of sixteen hundred and seven millions, were expenditures directly traceable to the war. But let us pass from that.

There was one rather strange spectacle presented by that Saint Louis convention, considering its composition, considering the men who controlled it and ruled its counsels. They arraign the republican party because we have honestly paid our debt, principal and interest, and paid enormous claims in the South, amounting to over $100,000,000, and several hundred millions in bounties and back-pay to our soldiers; and when we have done that, to find the men who composed the Saint Louis convention, largely composed of the leaders of the rebellion, criticising us for squandering the public money it seems to me is rather a strange and novel spectacle; but we are accustomed to such novelties now.

But let us take the next plank in this platform:

> We denounce the financial imbecility and immorality of that party which during eleven years of peace has made no advance toward resumption and no preparation for resumption, but instead has obstructed resumption by wasting our resources and exhausting all our surplus income, and while annually professing to intend a speedy return to specie payments has annually enacted fresh hinderances thereto. As such a hinderance, we denounce the resumption clause of the act of 1875, and we here demand its repeal.

Mr. President, I think the philosophy of political management in making a platform has exhausted itself in that plank. It is founded upon the false pretense that the democratic party ever favored resumption. I think I have sufficiently shown that. Then it goes on and denounces us for hindering resumption, for annually enacting fresh hinderances, or as devising such a hinderance as the fixing of a day for resumption. This is the logic of this plank: "We, who were always in favor of resumption, charge you with always hindering resumption and passing annual acts to prevent it." Governor Tilden, in his commentary, says we did it repeatedly to hinder resumption, "and we completed the hinderance by passing the resumption act fixing a day for resumption." That resumption act I now say in the face of the American people has resulted much more favorably than I had hoped. I introduced it with fear and doubt, believing that it was not powerful enough to accomplish the good that it has done. Let us look at it. Under the operations of the resumption act we have retired $29,200,000 of bank-notes by the voluntary action of the banks, merely in their effort, each for itself, to strengthen itself in view of resumption. We have also retired $12,380,772 of United States notes which are paid and canceled, not hereafter to be redeemed in coin. We have also provided for the actual redemption and cancellation of the whole amount of the fractional currency which is now being superceded by silver coin of the old standard and weight. Thus much has already been accomplished. It is only a year and a half since the act was passed, and we have already retired over $41,000,000 of currency; we have provided for the retirement of $45,000,000 of fractional currency; and we are now this moment at resumption in silver coin, the ancient coins of the United States.

I will now read the jeremiad of Governor Tilden over this resumption act:

> The act of Congress of the 14th of January, 1875, enacted that on and after the 1st of January, 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the legal-tender notes of the United States on presentation at the office of the Assistant Treasurer in the city of New York. It authorizes the Secretary to prepare and provide for such resumption of specie payments by the use of any surplus revenue not otherwise appropriated, and by issuing, in his discretion, certain classes of bonds. More than one and a half of the four years have passed. Congress and the President have continued ever since to unite in acts which have legislated out of existence every possible surplus applicable to this purpose.

Here is a severe arraignment of somebody for not passing acts in aid of resumption since the 14th day of January, 1875. That is the complaint made by Governor Tilden against Congress and the President. The republican party confess that they made the law providing for resumption of fractional currency, providing for the gradual retirement of greenbacks and bank-notes, but we have not provided the means of resumption! It is sufficient to say that, if Governor Tilden had read that resumption act through, he would have found there the most ample means furnished by the act itself to the Secretary of the Treasury to bring about and maintain resumption at the time named. He has the whole power of the Treasury of the United States and all the credit of the Government, the power to issue any of three classes of bonds. But, waiving that, suppose there were defects in that resumption act, and its only defect that I know of was that it did not contain specific measures and directions to the Secretary as to the mode and manner of resumption and as to the means to resume; that defect I pointed out when the bill was introduced, and I also stated that if the resumption act was defective in this respect Congress would be in session every year and it was to be presumed that Congress would provide any additional legislation necessary to accomplish the end in view. That was known to everybody, and now Governor Tilden denounces Congress and the President in these unmeasured terms:

> More than one and a half of the four years have passed. Congress and the President have continued ever since to unite in acts which have legislated out of existence every possible surplus applicable to this purpose.

What has the President done? It is the President that is arraigned. That act was passed on the 15th of January, 1875. Congress adjourned on the 4th of March, 1875. On the 4th of March, the republican party lost its power over Congress, much to the regret I believe of the people of the United States. From that time on there is other responsibility than ours for the acts of Congress. If it was necessary to pass ancillary legislation in aid of resumption, Congress must pass it. What has the President done? The President in his annual message to Congress expressly called attention to the fact that the proper means were not pointed out by this act and called upon Congress to give him the means. Here is the annual message of President Grant last December, now nine months ago. The President in his annual message recommends—

> That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to redeem, say, not to exceed $2,000,000 monthly of legal-tender notes, by issuing in their stead a long bond, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, of denominations ranging from $50 to $1,000 each. This would in time reduce the legal-tender notes to a volume that could be kept afloat without demanding redemption in large sums suddenly.
> Third. That additional power be given to the Secretary of the Treasury to accumulate gold for final redemption, either by increasing revenue, curtailing expenses, or both—it is preferable to do both; and I recommend that reduction of expenditures be made wherever it can be done without impairing Government obligations or crippling the due execution thereof.

General Grant recommended this Congress to do precisely what Governor Tilden says they have not done. They assail General Grant every day of their lives with the vilest calumny—a man who carried our banner through its danger in battle, whose life is distinguished by heroism, and whose name will be remembered with honor and veneration long after all of us have disappeared from the memory of time. He is arraigned as Washington was arraigned, like a common criminal; but this thing that he asked this Congress to do, this House to do, is what Governor Tilden says now ought to be done. Governor Tilden yet has the heart to arraign General Grant, and General Grant recommended as President precisely what Tilden says he would recommend. I will show you that Tilden in his letter has only quoted the identical recommendations of Grant almost word for word; that is, a funding bill and an accumulation of gold. And yet Governor Tilden, governor of New York and President that would be, arraigns the President for doing exactly what he advises should be done. The Secretary of the Treasury also fortifies the recommendation of the President by asking that—

> Authority be given for funding legal-tender notes into bonds bearing a low rate of interest.

There is what the President and his chief executive officer have done; and yet Governor Tilden arraigns them for doing it and says

Congress and the President have continued ever since to unite in acts to prevent resumption. If Congress has done it, who is responsible? Is the Senate responsible? We sent to the House a bill that would have lowered your rate of interest on the large mass of the public debt 1½ per cent. per annum. What attention did they pay to it? None whatever. What bill have they introduced to carry out the recommendation of General Grant or Governor Tilden? Where is the act introduced in the House of Representatives to accumulate gold or to provide for funding? None; and now I will tell you why it was not done in the Senate. It was because we knew it would tend to prevent the introduction of such a bill in the House. I say that such a bill funding United States notes into a 4 per cent. coin bond was not reported, such a one as we reported in the Senate in 1870, because we believed the passage of it in the Senate might tend to defeat it in the House. We could fairly infer this, because our passage of a funding bill to redeem 6 per cent. bonds with 4½ bonds by a unanimous vote was ignored by the House. I can tell my friend from Delaware that I could convince him that we were justified in that belief.

Mr. BAYARD. Every man must act on his own responsibility.

Mr. SHERMAN. Governor Tilden arraigns Congress for not introducing a bill to provide for funding. He arraigns his own party. One would suppose, in reading this letter of his, that he was arraigning the republicans. Sir, the power has passed from us to the other House. We had power in Congress for only six weeks after the resumption act passed, and the democratic House has had the power for nine months to pass such an act, and yet Governor Tilden arraigns the President for doing what he advises, and in so doing he arraigns his own party, the democratic House, for not introducing such a proposition as he promises, as he favors, or says he favors. Thus we have the actual fact of a democratic House, representing the democratic masses, showing what they intend to do when they have the full power of this Government, and the mere empty, bald, scolding words of the presidential candidate, chosen by that party, as to what he will try to do if Congress will allow him to do it. Why, Mr. President, it does seem to me that it presents the candidate for the Presidency on the democratic ticket in a very awkward position, arraigning his own democratic associates.

I wish now, Mr. President, to call your attention specially to the last paragraph of this plank in the democratic platform, which I charge here and which I will now prove was an afterthought inserted in this plank against the wishes of Governor Tilden; against his desire—as a political trick intended to carry an election; that he was opposed to it, and yet he devotes nearly one-half of his written letter in trying to convince somebody that fixing a day for resumption was a hinderance to resumption. I have read in the Star this evening a little paragraph which paraphrases the letter of Governor Tilden very well. It is the logic of a bummer applying to his promises the logic of Governor Tilden as to the promises of the United States in the resumption act:

"I have it," remarked an impecunious bummer on the Avenue Saturday, pausing in his perusal of Tilden's letter. "I know how to make 'thoughtful men' believe I'm going to pay my debts. I'll take back my specific promises to pay 'em. That'll fix it. Why the d—l didn't I think o' that? These promises o' mine destroy all confidence among thoughtful men, whose judgment will at last sway public opinion. An attempt to act on such promises would be a fresh calamity, prolific of confusion, distrust, and distress. Yes, sir; that's been my great financial failure—a makin' promises."

Mr. Tilden believes that the best way to keep a promise is to withdraw it. These notes are outstanding now with a law upon our statute-book that you will redeem them at a certain time. The best way is to withdraw that promise! That is his logic; and this, in order to secure confidence, not for the note but for the maker of the note, the man who withdraws the promise!

I proceed to show you, Mr. President, by a reference to the proceedings of the convention in Saint Louis, that when the friends of Governor Tilden went there they went determined to carry the plank that was read to you without the last clause which demands the repeal of the day fixed for resumption; but in the committee on resolutions this particular paragraph was added by the vote of those who were called inflationists. That clause was added against the remonstrance of those who supported and favored the nomination of Governor Tilden. Afterward when this resolution as I have read it to you was reported to the convention General Ewing, of Ohio, dissatisfied with the disingenuousness of this plank in the platform, seeing how totally ridiculous it left the Ohio democrats who the year before demanded more paper money and opposed all plans for resumption, insisted upon striking out this plank that has been read to you and inserting another provision, and I will now read from the New York Wold what occurred:

General Thomas Ewing, of Ohio, at the request of several members of the committee, presented a minority report as to one phrase of the platform, as follows:

"That the following clause in the resolutions be stricken out: 'As such hinderance we denounce the resumption clause of the act of 1875, and we here demand its repeal.'"

Mr. EWING. I desire to briefly state the objections to the clause which we propose to have stricken out: It denounces one clause only of the specie-resumption law, the clause fixing the time for the resumption of specie payments, leaving the rest of the act to stand unobjected to, and, by implication, approving it. But why does it object to the clause? Because it is destroying the business of the country in connection with the balance of the law? Not at all; but merely because it is a hinderance to specie payments, the fair inference being—at any rate, if not a fair one, an inference that will surely be drawn—that the objections of the national democratic party to the specie-resumption law are confined only to the date for resumption, and the objection to that date is a hinderance to resumption, and the construction will be given, and with some degree of plausibility at least, that the democratic party want resumption earlier than the day fixed. [Applause.]

Such was the statement made by General Ewing at the time. Hear the answer of Mr. Dorsheimer:

Mr. DORSHEIMER. I do not propose to speak upon this matter at length. I propose here to make a straight issue between soft and hard money. [Tremendous cheering.] By that we stand or fall. [Cheers.] If you want soft money, give your votes to the resolution offered by the most distinguished soft-money advocate in the United States. [Cheers and hisses.] But if you want to leave to the hard-money men some chance to carry their State, then stand by the report of the committee, [cheers,] which was a compromise so great that a protest has been signed by every one of the eastern democratic States, and to which I have put my signature. [Cheers.] Here is a middle ground which does leave some hope; but if you declare, in the language of the gentleman from Ohio, [General Ewing,] for a repeal forthwith, then abandon all your hopes. [Cheers.]

No one can read this debate that occurred in the Saint Louis convention without perceiving at once that this last clause was a trick, a device, with a double meaning, intended to be used in different sections with that double meaning. In Ohio and in the Western States it would be held that the repeal of the resumption clause was a repeal of the resumption act, and it is already being so done, while in New York it would be held that the repeal of the resumption clause was simply to wipe out of the way a hinderance to resumption, so that resumption could come sooner; and this double-dealing is plainly shown by the phraseology of the plank itself and by the debate that occurred there. Mr. Dorsheimer said: "We have given you all we can or dare do, and we have adopted this phraseology as a compromise and there we will stand." General Ewing might put his own construction on it and Mr. Dorsheimer might put his, and this is the thimble-rigging manipulation in the presence of the people of the United States on a question that so deeply affects them; we know that will be the result. Governor Tilden's letter, the whole tenor of it, shows a careful balancing of words. He conned and parsed over for more than a month words that when you read them one way mean so, and when you read them another way mean otherwise. It was carefully studied. Trained as he is in the school of Mr. Van Buren, or in the school of that greater statesman, Talleyrand, who believed that words were invented to conceal thoughts, the language is carefully weighed and framed so that it will read well in Indiana and well in New York, bearing a different interpretation wherever it is read, according to the humor and whim of the man who reads it. But Governor Hendricks states distinctly in a letter which was published why he wants the resumption clause repealed by the House of Representatives. He wrote to a Representative in Washington that "a repeal of the resumption clause in almost any form will elect the State ticket and carry the Indianapolis district." It was the election in Indiana and in the Indianapolis district which caused the House after eight months of weary studying and doubt to finally tremblingly send to us a provision to repeal a single clause of the act, and now when you read the act without that clause it is very hard to tell what effect that action of the House if adopted would have upon the meaning of the act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will yield I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask a question before we adjourn. Did I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that between June 30, 1865, and June 30, 1876, the reduction of the debt was $500,000,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. Over $500,000,000. I have given the exact figures.

And then, on motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, (at ten o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 9, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PARTITION OF REAL ESTATE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 3168) relating to partition of real estate in the District of Columbia, with an amendment by the Senate, for the purpose of moving that the House non-concur in the Senate amendment and ask a committee of conference.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move that the House non-concur in the Senate amendment and ask a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. WADDELL. I desire to renew the motion I made yesterday. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and put on its passage the bill (S. No. 1021) allowing the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails in their new iron steamships. I propose to offer an amendment to correct the date by striking out "7th February, 1865," and inserting "17th February, 1865."

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Postmaster-General to accept from the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, for service in transporting the mails of the United States between San Francisco and China, the steamships City of Sidney, City of New York, and City of San Francisco, the same being new iron American-built ships of more than three thousand tons register; said iron steamships to be substituted for any wooden side-wheel steamers now lawfully doing service under the act of Congress of February 7, 1865; provided that nothing contained in the bill shall be construed as creating, reviving, or recognizing any claim now pending, or as a basis of any claim which may hereafter be preferred, against the United States by said steamship company growing out of any existing law or contract whatever, except such as may lawfully exist under the law of February 7, 1865.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina whether this bill in any way extends the subsidy heretofore granted.

Mr. WADDELL. Not at all. The committees of both Houses were particularly careful in framing the language of the bill. As the name Pacific Mail Steamship Company was not of a very odorous one, we were on our guard and tried to protect the Government from any responsibility whatever.

Mr. RANDALL. The subsidy, if I understand it rightly, expires in two years.

Mr. WADDELL. The contract expires next January.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Next December.

Mr. WADDELL. The sum and substance of the matter is this: Under the contract of February 17, 1865, for carrying the mails the steamships were described in the contract and were to be of a particular character. Since that time this company has built new iron steamships, and when it went to the Department to obtain the privilege of carrying the mails in them the Department decided that under the law the mails could not be carried in any other character of steamships than those described in the contract. On behalf of the committee, in order to correct an error of date, I move to amend the bill by striking out "7" and inserting "17," after the word "February," wherever it occurs in the bill, so that it will read "February 17, 1865." And in order to obviate an objection which was suggested to me yesterday by some gentlemen on this floor I will move, with the consent of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to strike out the last clause of the proviso, which is as follows: "Except such as may lawfully exist under the law of February 7, 1865, above referred to."

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the Clerk again read the proviso.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as creating, reviving, or recognizing any claim now pending, or as the basis of any claim which may hereafter be preferred, against the United States by said steamship company, growing out of any law or contract whatever.

Mr. RANDALL. That might by inference imply that we recognized the fact that there is a claim, which we ought not to do.

Mr. WADDELL. Those who had charge of the bill thought they had excluded any claim. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] can suggest any other language that will better protect the Government the committee will agree to it.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman can readily see that, not having the contract before me, it is impossible for me to suggest the proper language to protect the United States. I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to say that the transportation of these mails shall be transferred from the side-wheel steamers to the iron steamers of this company.

Mr. WADDELL. That is all this bill is intended to accomplish.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think the Clerk read all of that proviso.

Mr. WADDELL. I have moved to strike out the last portion of the proviso, to obviate an objection which has been suggested.

Mr. RANDALL. Let that portion be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Except such as may lawfully exist under the law of February 7, [17,] 1865, above referred to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think it would be safer for the Government not to strike out these words. It seems to me they ought to be in rather than out.

Mr. RANDALL. Not the last clause.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes; that clause adds nothing, and I think it ought to stand.

Mr. RANDALL. That very exception might recognize the existence of a claim.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will not strike out those words. If you strike them out, you will by exception recognize the claim.

Mr. RANDALL. I am very timid about legislation in reference to these steamship companies, and particularly this one.

Mr. WADDELL. That is what made us try to guard this bill in the way we have done.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I would suggest that the following be inserted in place of the part proposed to be stricken out:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed to deprive said company of its compensation for ocean-mail service under the contract made by authority of an act of February 17, 1865.

That will make everything clear.

Mr. WADDELL. I do not know that I have any objection to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be added to what is in the bill, without striking out that last clause.

Mr. RANDALL. No, strike that out.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. It only gives the company the amount it gets to-day by the act of 1865. By striking out the last clause, without inserting anything, the company may be deprived of the subsidy which it has been receiving all the time. Therefore I suggest this amendment. Is it satisfactory?

Mr. LUTTRELL. There seems to be some misunderstanding in relation to this.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think it is necessary to put that in. There is no danger that the company will not get all that the law ever intended to give them or by implication can give them.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I want to say to my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] that, if this exception is stricken out and my amendment not allowed to go in, the steamship company cannot get the subsidy it now gets every month. Striking out that clause strikes out all contracts whatever.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no.

Mr. WADDELL. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. RANDALL. There has been an appropriation heretofore made, if I understand rightly, to comply with all the contracts we are bound by.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman is right, striking out this portion of the proviso will nullify all the appropriations heretofore made.

Mr. LUTTRELL. If this portion of the proviso is stricken out and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] is not permitted to offer the amendment he has just read, the Pacific Mail Steamship Company will not be allowed to receive the compensation now given them every month for carrying the mails.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall object to any amendment being made, except such as the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads recommend, unless it can be printed so that we can examine and fully understand it.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Then I ask that the bill go through, as the committee of the House and the Senate have passed it without amendment. We have examined it carefully and guarded it well. We were very cautious in this matter. I am willing, however, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] should place any amendment on it that he desires; all we ask is that the company shall be allowed to substitute iron steamers instead of the old wooden steamers which are now almost useless.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the committee are right in moving to strike out the last clause of the proviso, and I trust that the gentleman will now call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. WADDELL. I call for the previous question.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I do not wish to imperil the passage of the bill by placing any amendment upon it. The iron steamers are now lying at San Francisco, and we desire to have them substituted for the wooden steamers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair wishes to understand the situation. Did the gentleman from North Carolina demand the previous question to the exclusion of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND?]

Mr. WADDELL. I demanded the previous question to the exclusion of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. Which member from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that there is an amendment coming from the committee. He desires to know if the gentleman from North Carolina admits the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

Mr. WADDELL. I do not.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments offered by Mr. WADDELL were agreed to.

The question recurred upon the third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask leave to offer a substitute to the proviso.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That cannot be done under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. LAPHAM. If the gentleman from North Carolina will hear it I think he will assent to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the reading of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM?]

Mr. WADDELL. Yes, sir; I object.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LUTTRELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order.

EMPLOYMENT OF INDIAN SCOUTS.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill of the Senate concerning the employment of Indian scouts, which ought to be passed at this time. [Loud cries of "Regular order."]

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to present to the House the report of the majority of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in relation to their investigation of the affairs of that Department. I will state that the committee is authorized, as I understand, to report at any time, and that the minority report is ready.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the committee authorized to report at any time?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Chair will receive the report.

Mr. CONGER. Is this a matter of higher privilege than the matter before the House under the call for the regular order? We are acting now on a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that this matter is of higher privilege.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I will state that this matter will only occupy a moment. I move that the report be printed and laid upon the table, and yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to present the views of the minority of the committee.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I present the views of the minority with the same request that has been made by the chairman of the committee.

The report of the majority of the committee and the views of the minority were ordered to be printed and laid upon the table.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to have it understood that these reports are not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No motion to reconsider has been entered.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No, but I ask that the order be made by unanimous consent that the matter shall not be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there any matter for the action of the House connected with the report?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. There is none at all.

There was no objection, and the order was made.

ANNIE GIBSON YATES.

Mr. BAGBY. I report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which was authorized to report upon this subject at any time, the bill (H. R. No. 3964) granting a pension to Annie Gibson Yates.

The bill was read, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension-laws, the name of Annie Gibson Yates, widow of George W. Yates, late a captain in the United States Army, who was killed at the battle of the Little Big Horn on the 25th day of June, 1876, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read. It states that George W. Yates was a captain in the service of the United States in the Seventh Regiment of Cavalry and was killed in the battle with the Indians June 25, 1876, leaving his widow, Annie Gibson Yates, and three infant children surviving him; that he was killed in the service of the United States and in the line of duty. The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. My recollection is that this bill was recommitted with instructions to the committee to report the names of widows of other soldiers who were killed in the same engagement.

Mr. BAGBY. This bill for the relief of Mrs. Yates has no connection with the bill to which the gentleman alludes.

Mr. CONGER. I am informed that the instructions in regard to other persons interested in a measure of this kind related to another bill. I therefore make no objection to this.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAGBY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PASSAGE OF PACIFIC MAIL SUBSIDY.

Mr. LYNDE. I rise to make a privileged report under the instructions of the Committee on the Judiciary, which I ask may be printed and recommitted, and also printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MILLS. Let it be understood that the report shall not be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

A MEMBER. What is the subject of the report?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the introductory paragraph of the report, which will show its subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the papers and testimony taken by the Committee of Ways and Means of the Forty-third Congress, with instructions to inquire what action should be taken by the House in reference to the persons now members of the House charged with complicity in the alleged corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy in the China mail service during the Forty-second Congress, and with giving false testimony in relation thereto before the Committee of Ways and Means of the Forty-third Congress, have considered the same and report—

Mr. LORD. I am instructed by certain members of the Judiciary Committee to present a minority report upon the same matter, which I desire to have printed and recommitted, and also printed in the RECORD along with the majority report.

Mr. HALE. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. What is the object of having these reports printed in the RECORD? If printed as a document we shall get it from the document room.

Mr. LORD. We ask to have the reports printed in the RECORD because the Judiciary Committee think it ought to be done for the purpose of getting the matter before Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Iowa object to the printing of the reports in the RECORD?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understand that under the order of the House they will be printed in document form and can be obtained by us from the document room.

Mr. HOAR. My friend from Iowa will remember that any member by calling for the reading of these reports can have them printed in the RECORD; and the making of this order without the reading saves time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My object was to ascertain the reason for asking the printing in the RECORD.

Mr. BANKS. I will tell the gentleman. If the report be printed in the RECORD, it will appear at once and can be read by us to-morrow. If printed merely in document form, it may be two weeks before we get it, and not one man in fifty will see it in that form.

Mr. FRYE. And it is a subject which when it comes before the House will undoubtedly provoke very extensive discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If no objection be made these reports will be ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider, and also to be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The reports are as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the papers and testimony taken by the Committee of Ways and Means of the Forty-third Congress, with instructions to inquire what action should be taken by the House in reference to the persons now members of this House charged with complicity in the alleged corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy in the China mail-service during the Forty-second Congress and with giving false testimony in relation thereto before the Committee of Ways and Means of the Forty-third Congress, have considered the same, and report:

That the Committee of Ways and Means of the Forty-third Congress, after a thorough investigation of the charge that a large sum of money was used to secure the passage through Congress of an increased annual appropriation to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, in the nature of a subsidy, report, among other things: "The results of the evidence are that about $900,000 was disbursed upon the allegation that it was used in aid of the passage of the act now under investigation; that about $565,000 appears to have been paid to the exclusive use of persons having no official connection with such legislation; and that the disposition of the remaining $335,000 remains in doubt upon the evidence presented, but without any testimony showing that it was a reward paid to any person at that time a member of either House of Congress; and that the uncertainty attending the disposition of this latter sum is owing to the refusal of WILLIAM S. KING to testify the truth, and to the failure or refusal of JOHN G. SCHUMAKER to present all the facts which the committee believe it was in his power to give."

The committee report the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a copy of the testimony taken before the Committee of Ways and Means upon the question of a corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy for the China mail-service be delivered to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, to be by him laid before the House at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, to the end that they may make further inquiry and take due action upon the questions affecting WILLIAM S. KING and JOHN G. SCHUMAKER, and further proceed therein as they shall deem just.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House transmit to the United States district attorney a copy of the evidence taken before the Committee of Ways and Means upon the question of a corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy for the China mail-service, with direction to lay so much of the same as relates to the truth of the testimony given by WILLIAM S. KING and JOHN G. SCHUMAKER, before the grand jury of said District, for such action as the law seems to require.

The above resolutions were adopted by the House, and a copy of the evidence taken before the Committee of Ways and Means upon the question of a corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy for the China mail-service has been transmitted to the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia by the Clerk of the House in accordance with said resolution.

The whole subject is properly before the court; the offenses charged are crimes by statute, and the Constitution provides—

"No person shall be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury."

Your committee are of opinion that the House of Representatives has no authority to take jurisdiction of violations of law or offenses committed against a previous Congress. This is purely a legislative body, and entirely unsuited for the trial of crimes. The fifth section of the first article of the Constitution authorizes "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member." This power is evidently given to enable each House to exercise its constitutional function of legislation unobstructed. It cannot vest in Congress a jurisdiction to try a member for an offense committed before his election; for such offense a member, like any other citizen, is amenable to the courts alone. Within four years after the adoption of the first ten amendments to the Constitution, Humphrey Marshall, a Senator of the United States from Kentucky, was charged by the Legislature of his State with the crime of perjury, and the memorial was transmitted by the governor to the Senate for its action. The committee to whom it was referred reported against the jurisdiction of the Senate, and say:

"That in a case of this kind no person can be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and that in all such prosecutions the accused ought to be tried by an impartial jury of the State or district wherein the crime shall have been committed. Until he is legally convicted, the principles of the Constitution and of the common law concur in presuming that he is innocent. And they are also of opinion that as the Constitution does not give jurisdiction to the Senate, the consent of the party cannot give it, and that therefore the said memorial ought to be dismissed."

This report was adopted by a vote of 16 to 7. This is the construction given to said section in the first case presented to either House after its adoption by the statesmen who framed the Constitution, and we think it an authority which should control the case before the committee. We know of no public interest which will be promoted by further investigation. Your committee therefore recommend that the House leave these charges where they now are, in court, to be finally adjudicated and disposed of without any interposition or further action of the House.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned members of the Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred the resolution of the 24th of January last, set forth in the report of the majority, respectfully report:

That the only question now presented to the House is the question of jurisdiction, which question arises under the last clause of section 5 of article 1 of the Constitution:

"Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member."

It will be seen that there are no words of limitation on the power to expel, which seems to have been left to the good sense and discretion of each House; in other words, does not the Constitution refer rather to the fitness of the member to hold the office, resting on considerations of public justice and policy, than to the time of his election? Yet the undersigned do not deny but that there are limitations on the power of this House arising from the circumstances of particular cases, and the relations of this House to the constituency of an accused member; therefore, as will be seen, the undersigned need not go further in this case than to assert jurisdiction, because the offenses complained of were not known to the constituents of the members in question until after their election.

Without asserting the guilt of the accused it is sufficient to say that the gravamen of the charges made against them is that one of them (Mr. SCHUMAKER) received the sum of $275,000 and the other, (Mr. KING,) while an officer of the House, $75,000 for the purpose of purchasing the votes of members of the Congress for a subsidy to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and it is conceded that the alleged reception of such money by them was not known to their constituents until after their election.

It is also alleged that one of the members (Mr. KING) testified falsely concerning the moneys received by him before his election to the present House and that the other (Mr. SCHUMAKER) so testified after his election to the present House before a committee of the Forty-third Congress.

The fact that the questions involved as to the guilt of the accused members have been referred to the courts of the District of Columbia does not and cannot affect the question of jurisdiction, nor in any manner release the House from its duty in the premises, as has been held in the cases of Kilbourn and Belknap.

The case of Humphrey Marshall referred to in the report of the majority is not a case in point. He was accused of the crime of perjury committed before a State court in Kentucky; a majority of the Senate concluded that he was entitled to a trial before a jury; if the members in the cases before this Congress were accused of the crime of perjury committed in a State court, in dealing with the question entirely different considerations might be presented. The committee of the Senate in the case of Marshall say, "That in a case of this kind no person can be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury."

This decision, however, only relates to trials in court in the administration of criminal justice, and not to protective justice by proceedings on impeachment or expulsion from either House of Congress. Without now discussing or deciding the question to what depths of infamy a member must have sunk, if condoned by his constituents, before the House should exercise the power to expel him, or without deciding that there is any depth of infamy which if so condoned would authorize such expulsion, it is sufficient to say that in the cases before the House the offenses as alleged related directly to the attempted corruption of members of the Congress of the United States, which crime or crimes, wherever originated, were consummated, as alleged, in the District of Columbia or within the halls of the Capitol.

In the State of New York, in the case of George G. Barnard, one of the justices of its supreme court, he was held liable to impeachment for offenses committed by him before he was elected to the term of office which he then held. The senate of that State has asserted the same principle.

The Senate of the United States has recently held jurisdiction in a case in which the alleged limitation, if any, forbidding it, is found in the words of the Constitution.

The undersigned therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House of Representative has jurisdiction in the cases of WILLIAM S. KING and JOHN G. SCHUMAKER, and that it be referred to the Committee on Civil Service Reform to ascertain and report the facts.

SCOTT LORD.
WM. LAWRENCE.
GEO. F. HOAR.
B. G. CAULFIELD.

I am of the opinion that the House ought not to assume jurisdiction of a case where a member is charged with having sworn falsely at a time prior to his election, especially if such member has been indicted therefor before the proper judicial tribunal, and pending his trial. But where the charge is that a member of the House has received money to be used by him to corrupt legislation in Congress, for which offense no indictment has been found, I think the House may properly take jurisdiction, though the offenses charged were committed prior to his election. I am desirous that an inquiry be made to ascertain whether this latter offense has been committed by either or both of the accused members, and for that purpose, and to that extent, I concur in the report of the minority of the committee.

GEO. W. McCRARY.

VENEZUELAN CLAIMS.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, with accompanying correspondence relative to the Venezuelan mixed commission, and also sundry memorials on that subject, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to submit a report.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is this a unanimous report?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is.

Mr. HALE. How is this a privileged report?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state that this is the unanimous report of the committee so far as the recommendations are concerned, although certain members of the committee have appended their own explanations to the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Has the committee the right to report on this subject at any time?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir, under the resolution of the House.

Mr. HALE. How has it that right?

Mr. SPRINGER. More than forty-eight hours ago the report was read to the minority of the committee, and their explanations accompany it.

Mr. HALE. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is not forty-eight hours since the resolution to which the gentleman refers was passed.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is exactly forty-eight hours now.

Mr. HALE. Why, the resolution was adopted at five o'clock on last Monday evening.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest if no member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs objects, certainly it must be right.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is the unanimous report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HALE. It does not by any means follow. The resolution agreed to the other night was adopted after full deliberation, and I do not propose it shall be broken here in any case whatever.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that the question was asked at the time whether reports which were unanimous could not come in at any time, and the gentleman from Maine expressly stated there would be no objection to them.

Mr. HALE. I said that in any case where both sides of the committee wanted to report.

Mr. SPRINGER. And that is the case here.

Mr. HALE. I said in such cases consent would be granted.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is a unanimous report.

Mr. HALE. I do not know anything of that kind. There is no member of the minority of this committee that comes in and asks to have this report considered.

Mr. SPRINGER. The minority of the committee can speak for itself. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] who sits near the gentleman is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman from Ohio, as a member of the minority of that committee, states that he wants this matter to come up now, I have nothing further to say. Otherwise it is not clearly here under that rule we adopted on Monday. The gentleman from New York will bear me out in that.

Mr. BEEBE. I will say this: I did not understand the arrangement, so far as I am concerned, as does the gentleman from Maine. However, I learn that such was his understanding and so have held back my report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there is no objection then by any member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Chair understands the report may be made. If there is objection the Chair must enforce the rule.

Mr. HALE. I leave the objection entirely to the minority of the committee.

Mr. MILLS. It is privileged, as the minority has consented to the making of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unquestionably.

Mr. BANKS. What is this report in reference to? Is it the Venezuelan investigation?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANKS. As a member of that committee I object to its being published now.

Mr. SPRINGER. On what ground?

Mr. HALE. This shows the wisdom of my calling attention to the matter.

Mr. BANKS. The resolution accompanying the report is suspensory of judgment on the part of the Government. The report goes over the whole matter, and expresses conclusions from which the minority of the committee dissent, myself positively, in regard to it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman's dissent is part of the report.

Mr. BANKS. We have not considered the question, nor is the testimony in. It does not belong to the resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman's dissent is on record as part of the report.

Mr. BANKS. No, my assent is to the resolution reported; but my dissent is to the conclusion of the report.

Mr. SPRINGER. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to object to the consideration of the report now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must sustain the point of order made under the rule adopted on Monday, and the report cannot be received at this time, objection being made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, a member of that committee.

MISSISSIPPI INVESTIGATION.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I rise to a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. I am instructed by that committee to report back a concurrent resolution from the Senate that four thousand copies of the report of the Special Committee to Investigate the Late Election in Mississippi, with the views of the minority, be printed for the use of the Senate, with the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Senate," in the last line, add the following: "And House of Representatives; 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives;" so it will read:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 4,000 copies of the report of the Special Committee to Investigate the late Election in Mississippi, with the views of the minority, be printed for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives; 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,500 copies for the use of the House.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the gentleman reporting this what is the customary course in such cases? I see here the Senate has passed a resolution, as I understand, providing for the printing of 4,000 copies of this valuable report, with the expectation that the House committee would report an additional number for the use of the House. As I listened to the reading, it seemed to me the committee had taken the number the Senate fixed for that body, and distributed it to both the bodies. Is it not customary to give the Senate the number of copies of any particular report that its Committee on Printing recommends and is acceded to by the Senate, and then for the House, independent of that, to order an additional number? I do not see why we should cut down the number called for by the Senate, which is four thousand copies, to fifteen hundred copies. The report is on an important subject-matter. It has already given rise to debate in the Senate, which will undoubtedly be prolonged; and whenever the matter comes up here it will be treated as a matter of very grave and almost vital interest. The number of copies called for by the Senate does not seem to me to be too large for that body; and if we have twice as many here, I do not think that would be too large for this House.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I presume the gentleman from Maine is correct in his statement of the course which has been pursued in the past. Some of the members of the Senate were anxious that action should be taken upon this matter. The resolution was sent here for concurrence on the part of the House, because the printing of four thousand copies would cost a greater sum than $500. And as we had heretofore during this session in other matters made a division of copies, we made a division in this case. This is not discriminating against one body or in favor of the other.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he allow me to move an amendment. As I have said, this is a very important matter. If we make the number for the Senate, say three thousand copies, and for the House six thousand copies, that will be only nine thousand copies of the report for both bodies. And I am very sure that that number will speedily be exhausted, because the public interest—and it is not confined to one party—in the question is very great. I would like to move the amendment I have indicated.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. As the gentleman from Maine is perhaps aware, the reports of the majority and minority of the committee are being published broadcast throughout the land; and if it had not been the wish of the Senate to have this number of copies printed I should not have given my assent.

Mr. HALE. What does the gentleman mean? Does he mean that they are being published in the newspapers?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. Yes; when published in the prominent newspapers they are within reach of and read by the people of the country.

Mr. HALE. Still I think the publication in the newspapers is not sufficient.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a campaign document, I suppose, and the Senate desired to have it published.

Mr. HALE. If it be a campaign document it is a campaign document on both sides. One of the ablest of the democratic Senators has made a minority report.

Mr. RANDALL. Let each side print what they think proper.

Mr. HALE. I think that would scarcely be a good rule. We publish as congressional documents important reports that have a political bearing and publish them generally very freely, although the newspapers and party associations publish them aside from that. It does not follow because a report from a committee on a grave subject-matter which has been discussed as this has been on both sides and reported on both sides has political bearings that it should on that account be given the go-by here.

Mr. RANDALL. We do not give it the go-by any more than you give the go-by to the reports of other investigations which you print only up to the amount fixed by law, $500. We do not desire to incur an unlimited expense in printing such documents.

Mr. HALE. It is a very small saving that can be effected here. This is a subject-matter which I do not think the gentleman can afford any penny-wise wisdom upon.

Mr. RANDALL. I am also reminded that this investigation of affairs in the State of Mississippi was conducted just as other investigations have been conducted in this House, and to which the gentleman from Maine has objected; that is, in a secret manner.

Mr. HALE. I fail to see in the discussions in the Senate any complaint on that score.

Mr. REAGAN. Then the gentleman from Maine has not examined the minority report. The investigation was conducted in secret, against the votes of both of the democratic members of the committee.

Mr. HALE. I was speaking of the discussions in the Senate. I do not think that information upon this important matter should be suppressed or should be kept from the people. I think both of the reports should be freely published.

Mr. RANDALL. This is but an entering-wedge for the printing by Congress of political documents. The investigation was gotten up in my judgment for political purposes only. You made the same charge against us that we have been conducting these investigations for political purposes. And yet, perhaps for that reason, we asked for the printing of no additional copies of the reports.

Mr. HALE. Have we on our side ever objected to the printing of additional copies?

Mr. RANDALL. The printing of additional copies involves a large expense which I am unwilling to incur.

Mr. HALE. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to offer the amendment I have indicated, that I may take the sense of the House upon it.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the number provided for is amply sufficient, with the publication of these documents through the newspapers of the country.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman decline to allow me to offer my amendment simply to try the sense of the House on increasing the number of copies of these reports? The gentleman can shut me out if he chooses.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I should not shut the gentleman out if my mind were not clear upon the point. I must decline to admit his amendment.

Mr. HALE. All I want is a vote upon it. I put it in that way simply to aid in the diffusion of intelligence upon this subject-matter. Now the gentleman can shut me out if he chooses. All I ask is a vote.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. If this resolution would shut out a dissemination of these reports from the people of the country I should not hesitate a moment to permit the amendment to go in, but the gentleman knows the principal part of both the reports has been or will be published in every prominent paper in the country.

Mr. HALE. That is just my point; we want an authentic official report and not one culled and picked by newspaper editors to go out to the people. We want the official report to be sent to each citizen. I do not want that the New York newspapers or the Boston newspapers shall tell what is in the report.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. As I understand it, the newspapers do not cull or pick from the reports; they simply publish them in full. One of the reports was published in a Washington paper.

Mr. HALE. Not in full.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. The principal points were published.

Mr. HALE. But the report was not published in full. I ask the gentleman if he will allow me to submit my amendment to a vote?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. For the reasons I have already stated, I must decline to allow a vote on that amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope my colleague [Mr. VANCE] will allow me a moment. I want to say that the report involves the integrity of a whole State and the validity of its Legislature and its elections under that Legislature, and there can hardly be a graver question than that which raises the question whether a State Legislature was legally organized or not. This is a complete report of both parties, and they ask that it be printed. It seems to me only fair that an official document shall not be garbled, but that the full statement of the case shall go to the country. I am sure that gentlemen on the other side will not put themselves in the attitude of suppressing the report.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suppress any report that proposes to reduce a State of this Union to a territorial condition simply because the people of that State happen to vote for a certain political party.

Mr. GARFIELD. If that were true, and I were in the gentleman's place, I would ask that the report be printed and sent into every hamlet in the country.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I call the previous question.

The question was put on seconding the previous question; and on a division there were—ayes 81, noes 63.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred upon ordering the main question.

Mr. HALE. I call for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, so as to give us an opportunity of putting in my amendment if the main question be voted down.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. The gentleman will understand that the Senate asked for only four thousand copies, and the only difference between our report is that we ask the distribution of a part of these copies to the House.

Mr. HALE. But my amendment cuts the Senate out of one thousand copies and gives us six thousand.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 104, nays 63, not voting 118; as follows:

During the roll-call,

Mr. HOUSE said: My colleague, Mr. YOUNG, is detained from the House on account of sickness.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to state that my colleague on the Committee on Indian Affairs from Arkansas, Mr. WILSHIRE, is absent from the House upon committee work.

Mr. FREEMAN. I am paired with Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. MILLIKEN. If he were present I would vote "no."

Mr. WILLIS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. LEAVENWORTH.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. WALLING, is absent by leave of the House.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question was upon the amendment reported from the Committee on Printing, to add after the word "Senate," in the last line of the resolution, the following:

And House of Representatives; 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate and 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question then was upon concurring in the resolution as amended.

Mr. REAGAN. Before the House votes on that question, I desire to say one word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not now in order.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 75, noes 7.

Mr. POPPLETON. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, the Chair under the rule will order tellers; and appoints Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, and Mr. PAGE to act as tellers.

The tellers took their places; but before the House proceeded to vote,

Mr. POPPLETON said: I will withdraw the point of order that no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any demand for a further count?

There being no call for a further count, the resolution, as amended, was declared to be concurred in.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING THE AGRICULTURAL REPORTS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 1036 be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 1036) to provide for the printing and distribution of the reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the years 1874 and 1875 was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CROUNSE. I rise to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to make a privileged report.

UNITED STATES SURVEYS AND SCIENTIFIC EXPEDITIONS.

Mr. CROUNSE. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the joint resolution of the House No. 161, authorizing the Secretary of State to publish a history of the several surveys and scientific expeditions by the United States during the present century, to report the same back, with a recommendation that it do pass. This joint resolution was referred to the committee a few days since with leave to report it at any time.

The joint resolution directs the Secretary of State to cause to be prepared and published a brief history of the several surveys and scientific expeditions ordered and prosecuted by the United States during the century just closed, including in said history the various foreign and oceanic expeditions, the surveys of the coast and of the lakes, and the several topographical, scientific, and military surveys of the interior, the same to be reported to Congress as soon as practicable, said history not to exceed eight hundred pages octavo; and to enable the Secretary to carry into effect the resolution the sum of $7,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is appropriated.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman whether, in his opinion, that amount of money will complete the work?

Mr. CROUNSE. I am so advised upon consultation with the proper authorities.

Mr. GARFIELD. When I first drew up this joint resolution, I put in the sum of $10,000. The Librarian of Congress, who is an expert in all such matters, told me that he thought that $7,500 would be sufficient, and on that hint and suggestion I cut the amount down to $7,500. I think this will be one of the most interesting centennial records of the progress of this country that can be made.

Mr. CROUNSE. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CROUNSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYÉS IN PRINTING BUREAU.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, submitted a concurrent resolution concerning certain employés in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. COX. I desire to make a request on behalf of my friend from West Virginia, Mr. WILSON, who has been ill nearly all the session and who desires to go home. There is on the Speaker's table an application by him for leave of absence for ten days. I ask unanimous consent that leave of absence be granted him for that length of time.

No objection was made, and leave was granted accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAGE. I now insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called for, the House will now resume the consideration of the unfinished business at the time of adjournment yesterday, upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that the unfinished business of yesterday takes precedence of the morning hour to-day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman will refer to the rule concerning the morning hour, he will find that the morning hour begins after the reading of the Journal and the completion of the unfinished business at the time of the adjournment the day previous.

Mr. BLAND. May I inquire what is the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The unfinished business is the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to reconsider the vote by which the message of the President in regard to the sundry civil appropriation bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLAND. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] obtained the floor yesterday and yielded to a motion to adjourn. He is now entitled to the floor, and while he holds it the motion to lay on the table cannot be made. When the floor is yielded that motion can be made by any gentleman.

Mr. BLAND. I hope that will not be done, and that we will have something more important to take up our time than to prove that the South is against the North or the North against the South.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is entitled to the floor and will proceed.

POLITICAL CONDITION OF THE SOUTH.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I was desirous the other day, when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] concluded his interesting remarks, to make some observations which were suggested by his speech. I have in vain sought an opportunity until the present time. I listened to the speech of the gentleman with mingled feelings of pleasure and regret. I always hear him with gratification whenever he chooses to address the House on important public questions. His speech the other day was a masterpiece of intellectual power and skill. I cannot conceive that the opinions he advanced could have been defended with more power of argument or commended with more adroit and persuasive appeal to those of his countrymen who differ from him. I certainly am not one of those, if any there are, who would impute to the gentleman from Mississippi any want of sincerity in the opinions he has advanced in this debate, or in the positions he has heretofore taken which have attracted the attention of the country. I shared with the people of my own State in the pleasure created by his manly and eloquent tribute to the memory of our beloved Senator. I do not arrogate to myself the right to go behind the public utterances of gentlemen in debate here and impute to them motives which they themselves disclaim. If I did, I freely say that I deem it incredible that a man should know how to touch the noblest chords of manly sympathy in the hearts of his countrymen unless such sympathies were congenial to his own breast. I was therefore especially sorry that in sounding for his party the key-note of the coming presidential campaign the gentleman seems to have wholly abandoned the sentiments toward the majority of his countrymen and the Government of his country which actuated him on the occasion to which I have referred.

His last speech, however philosophic its guise or however apparently calm or impartial, was in full accord with the uniform tone of the democratic press, northern and southern. It was in full accord with the uniform current of speech which has prevailed among his associates in this Hall whenever questions relating to the condition of the South have arisen, beginning with the suppressed utterances of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] in the early part of the session, who threatened us with a new war in which he and his friends were to defend the Constitution against republican invasion, continuing with the speech of the gentleman's own colleague from Mississippi, who told us we had broken every oath we ever took, down to the time when the gentleman from New York made his grim and ghastly jests over the Hamburgh massacre, and when the eloquent gentleman from Virginia, "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaking;" denounced "the tyrannical Government" of his country. Was it in mockery or in self-delusion that after the arraignment of a majority of his countrymen made by the eloquent gentleman from Mississippi, he ended by commending to us the sentiment of the poet—

Thy gentleness hath made thee great.

The gentleman's speech was a bitter invective against the Government, of whose magnanimity in restoring him to his political rights after an attempt to destroy it he confessed himself the other day a conspicuous instance. The murders and outrages committed upon weak, unoffending, defenseless American citizens are to him but the attempt of a down-trodden people to turn itself in its agony under the heel of an oppressor. The attempt of the Government of the United States to exercise its constitutional authority to preserve to the majority in any southern State the right of free and fair elections are to him but the exertion of a hostile and alien power to keep down in the dust what he terms "his people," by which term I suppose he means the white democrats of the South. The amendments of the Constitution by which four millions of the laboring classes of the South, whose fathers had dwelt for generations upon its soil, to whose unpaid toil its greatness, its wealth, its prosperity are largely owing, to whose Christian forbearance the safety of the homes of the wives, of the children, of the South was due while the whites were away during four years of war waged for their oppression—a body of people speaking the same language, of the same religion, bound to them by ties so close that he says "every black man and black woman and black child in the South was bound by the most tender affection to some white man or white woman or white child"—the amendments, I say, by which these persons were enfranchised he speaks of as "crushed in" upon the institutions of the South. He compares this enfranchisement to the sudden pouring in upon the people of New England and New York of 4,000,000 of Chinese coolies. The policy by which 4,000,000 negroes received their place as equals among 15,000,000 suggests to him Gibbon's famous sentence that the most hateful despotism in the world is the rule of a people by its own slaves. Truly—

Thy gentleness hath made thee great.

I trust the people of the North will read the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi. They will judge of the expediency of committing the destinies of the colored people to a party of whose sentiment those to which I am replying are by the common judgment of its members the mildest type.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON. While the gentleman is upon this subject and declaiming so eloquently in behalf of the colored people of Mississippi, depicting their condition——

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman, I suppose, does not interrupt me for an argument.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope the gentleman will allow me a moment, I have always been courteous to my associates on this floor.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON. I want to have read a telegram which I received this morning from some colored citizens of the State of Mississippi.

Mr. HOAR. I object. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that any courtesy of debate requires a gentleman to yield to another to make an argument or to put in what he regards as facts on the other side. If I have misrepresented the gentleman personally, or misrepresented any fact in regard to his State, I am perfectly willing to yield for a correction.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will the gentleman allow me to state the purport of this telegram?

Mr. HOAR. If it pertains to what I was stating.

Mr. SINGLETON. I wish to set the facts in a proper light before the country. This telegram I have received this morning.

Mr. HOAR. I will not have any doubts about the question of courtesy; I yield for the reading of the telegram.

Several MEMBERS. Send it up to the desk to be read.

Mr. HOAR. No; read it yourself.

Mr. CONGER. They will not extend your time, and why do you let it be read?

Mr. HOAR. O, they will not refuse that, I am sure.

Mr. SINGLETON. I wish to state before the dispatch is read this one fact: The parties who have sent that telegram, one of them was a republican clerk of the county court of Yazoo County last year, but is now acting with the democratic party. The other one was a slave belonging to my wife's father's estate, to whom, in conjunction with five others, I sold a plantation for $13,500, every dollar of which has been paid, and he is now living on the place with others. The dispatch will explain itself. I want, while you are making such a clamor over the troubles of the colored people in Mississippi, that you hear what they say for themselves.

The Clerk read as follows:

YAZOO CITY, MISSISSIPPI, August 8, 1876.

Hon. O. R. SINGLETON:

Big barbecue on hand for 15th August. Your presence is indispensable and we urge you to come. Answer.

W. H. FOOTE,
LEWIS HOY,
Committee.

Mr. SINGLETON. I want to say in addition that these gentlemen are both colored and supporters of the democratic party. They were once republican. Now you see where they stand. It is an invitation to a barbecue, gotten up in part or in whole by colored people.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the gentleman would come up sometime in the course of the summer to a clam-bake on Cape Cod, and I will extend him an invitation now for that purpose. [Laughter.]

Mr. LYNCH. I wish to state that I know Mr. Foote personally, having served in the Legislature with him for several years. I know him to be a good republican when he is at liberty to be that. He lives in the county of Yazoo, (in Yazoo City,) a county that was carried last year for my honorable colleague by a system of organized terrorism and violence. Otherwise, that gentleman, instead of inviting my colleague to speak, would invite whoever may be nominated against him to speak.

Mr. SINGLETON. One word in response. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentlemen on the other side extend my time? [Cries of "Yes."]

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not think there will be any objection to the extension of the gentleman's time. I regret the gentleman from Maine was not equally as courteous as the gentleman from Massachusetts when I asked him to yield to me yesterday.

Mr. HALE. I knew my time was running out and declined to yield to other gentlemen besides the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SINGLETON. But we will not discuss that In the county of Yazoo the registered vote was about 3,500, perhaps 3,600, and I received of that number about 3,347 votes. You may intimidate men and keep them from the polls, but you cannot drive them to the polls and force them to vote the ticket you wish.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know about that.

Mr. SINGLETON. There was no intimidation at said election on election-day. I have in my possession now a circular printed and published by Mr. Foote, and a number of others, declining to be candidates at all, because they did not wish or intend to run on the republican ticket, having abandoned the party, as they said. I have said circular in my possession, and will produce it before the House if necessary.

Mr. HOAR. I make no question of the individual character or kindness of heart of the gentleman from Mississippi. On the contrary, I am happy to state publicly that some soldiers in my district heard with pleasure that he had taken a seat in the Congress of the United States because of his chivalrous kindness to them when they were prisoners and under his charge. But in the State of Mississippi at the last election, the democratic chairman of the State committee telegraphed to one of his associates to take care that the chairman of the republican State committee was not murdered, saying that they had nearly got through their election and all was going well and they did not want to give any handle to anybody; and his correspondent replies by telegraphing—I have forgotten the name of the man now—but the democratic correspondent telegraphed back that the republican was all safe and that he owed the safety of his life to that dispatch.

Mr SINGLETON. That happened in my own county. I chance to know the gentleman, General Warner. He came to the county of Madison, at one of the little out-of-the-way voting-precincts, on the day of election, and I do not suppose there was any man there who was not in as much danger of being injured as General Warner. His presence was not considered of so much importance as to put his life in jeopardy.

Mr. HOAR. The person to whom the chairman of the democratic central committee telegraphed did not so consider it. He said he owed the safety of his life to the safe-conduct sent by telegraph. "Your dispatch saved Warner," was his reply.

I intended to deal with the subject a little later on. The argument of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] was in substance this: He said there existed throughout the civil service of the country great corruption, and on the part of the majority of the American people great dissatisfaction; that there stood between the remedy for that maladministration and the people an organization called party, the republican party. He quoted certain authorities to show that such an organization having in its control some hundred thousand of office-holders could permanently deprive forty millions of the American people of the right of self-government and prevent them from executing any reform. He said that the objection to overthrow that party and remove them from power consisted in the fear that it was not safe to trust the liberties of the newly enfranchised colored men at the South, and the gains crystallized into the amendments of the Constitution, to the democratic party of the former slave States. He half conceded and half denied that there had been any outrages or murders on the part of the democratic party of the Southern States. But if there had been, he said, everything that had happened was justified by the misgovernment under which those States labored and by the unwarrantable Federal interference with their right of local self-government. That is the substance of his argument, and it is that argument to which I propose to reply.

The gentleman, however, not very consistently with his claim that this strong, vigorous, wealthy, defiant American people could not defend itself against a hundred thousand postmasters and custom-house officers, went on to scout the idea that the armed democratic organizations of the Southern States, drilled and compacted, numbering millions, wielding the State power of those States, could ever be a menace or danger to the liberties of the same American people. On the other hand, his argument was that the hundred thousand unarmed people, the insignificant postmasters and custom-house officers and revenue officers of this country, constituted a danger to our liberties which, when they reached the number of a hundred thousand, it was impossible for the American people to overcome; while at the same time the armed, desperate, unscrupulous millions taking possession of and wielding lawlessly the powers of from eleven to fifteen States, and allied with their political associates at the North, constitute no danger which any wise statesman could for a moment regard.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to address myself to these propositions in their order; in the first place, to the claim that there is a prevalent corruption or maladministration of political affairs in this country which should alarm or excite the fears of the American people for the purity of their Government or the perpetuation of their liberties. I do not think any man will accuse me of refraining anywhere from fully asserting, emphasizing, and condemning any act of misgovernment or corruption because that act proceeded from a republican quarter. I agree that the republican party has in some important cases misplaced its confidence and that there has been in some high quarters error of judgment in selecting and failure of vigor in detecting and removing unworthy officers; but having investigated this question with some care, I declare my belief that the sixteen years in which the republican party have held the power in this Government have been purer and freer from corruption or maladministration of any sort than the sixteen years which followed the inauguration of General Washington. I believe that is true not only proportionately, but absolutely. We have forty millions of population, and they had but five or six. We have nearly a hundred thousand office-holders and raise a revenue of three hundred millions a year, and they had but a few thousand office-holders and raised a revenue of but a few millions. But I believe there is absolutely less of corruption and less of maladministration and less of vice and evil in public life than there was in the sixteen years which covered the administration of Washington, the administration of John Adams, and the first term of Jefferson. I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi himself when he says:

> We must believe that the moral character of our people is sound, that they enter upon the second century of their nationality with increased moral earnestness, with higher standards of public virtue and official rectitude.

I believe, with that accomplished orator and scholar Dr. Storrs, that—

> There never has been a time, not here alone but in any country, when the fierce light of incessant inquiry blazing on men in public life would not have revealed forces of evil like those we have seen, or when the condemnation which followed the discovery would have been sharper.

The republican party, as I have said, has controlled the Government for sixteen years, a term equal to that which covers the whole administration of Washington, the whole administration of John Adams, and the first term of Jefferson. It has been one of those periods in which all experience teaches us to expect an unusual manifestation of public corruption, of public disorder, and of evils and errors of administration. A great war; the time which follows a great war, great public debts, currency and values inflated; the exertion of new and extraordinary powers for the safety of the state; the sudden call of millions of slaves to a share in the Government—any one of these things would be expected to create great disturbance, and give rise to great temptations and great corruptions. Our term of office has seen them all combined. And yet I do not scruple to affirm that not only has there been less dishonesty and less maladministration in the sixteen years of republican rule proportionally to the numbers and wealth of the people than in the first sixteen years after the inauguration of Washington, but there has been less absolutely of those things.

Why, Mr. Speaker, one of the most famous generals of the revolutionary war, whose life extended down to the period to which I have alluded, while he was Quartermaster-General, was in partnership with a firm for the purpose of selling quartermaster's stores to the Government and making a profit, corresponding with his partner secretly and in cipher. The Attorney-General and Secretary of State, Washington's friend, while he was Secretary of State was detected in receiving money from France as a bribe to thwart the foreign policy of the administration of which he was a member. Another Cabinet officer of Washington, Hamilton, being charged with a corrupt official relation with a citizen, defended himself by acknowledging to his countrymen, over his own signature, a profligate relation to the wife of the person named. Still another Cabinet officer of Washington wrote a letter, which is in existence in my own State, in which he admitted to his correspondent, and begged his correspondent to help him to conceal from the public view, an act of personal dishonor compared to which the crime charged upon Belknap is as the act of an archangel. Why, sir, at the beginning of the last four years of the period of which I speak who were the candidates whom the great American people brought forward for their first office? Who received an equal number of democratic votes with Jefferson in the electoral college? Who was supported by the federalists in the House against Jefferson through thirty-seven ballotings? Aaron Burr, the man who, by an act half duel and half murder, deprived his countrymen of the precious and costly life of Hamilton; Aaron Burr, who a few years after, the great office of Vice-President scarcely laid down, organized a treasonable and corrupt intrigue against the Government of his country and against neighboring territory, the punishment of which he escaped by an acquittal by a jury on technical grounds, Chief Justice Marshall presiding in court.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these things were not known. Washington concealed the act of his Secretary of State from his countrymen and accepted his resignation. The difference between the two generations is the Drummond light which the press turns upon all these transactions and under which the moral sense of the country indignantly demands their exposure and punishment. I wonder if the gentleman from Mississippi or any of his associates on the other side of the House have heard of the Yazoo claim. In the year 1795 the State of Georgia owned the lands now constituting the greater portion of the State of Mississippi on the eastern bank of the Mississippi, then called the Mississippi country. An association was got up to buy those lands at an inadequate and fraudulent price from the Legislature of the State of Georgia. They had been offered some $800,000 or a million dollars; but they passed an act selling them to this association for $500,000. There was a great public excitement on the subject, and the next year the Legislature of Georgia ordered an investigation. They found that of the majority of the house of representatives of the State of Georgia every man had received a bribe in money or lands, and that the same was true of a large number in the senate, who had passed the bill by a majority of one. The next year they passed a statute, which I have before me, in which they recited the facts I have stated and proceeded to enact that the public records of the State of Georgia concerning this transaction should be taken into the court and burned in the presence of the Legislature. They provided also that wherever a deed was recorded under that statute in any county of the State the record should be taken to the county court and there burned; "to the end," as the law goes on to say, "that no trace of so unconstitutional, vile, and fraudulent transaction should appear except the infamy attached to it by the repealing statute."

Now the State of Georgia subsequently ceded this tract of land back to the United States, and claimants under the fraudulent sales came to Congress under the administration of Mr. Jefferson and a lobby was formed, of which the Postmaster-General of the United States under Mr. Jefferson was at the head, and they attempted to get a confirmation of the fraudulent grant through Congress. It is said—whether it be true or not I do not know—that seventy members of the two branches of Congress had been corruptly induced to promise their consent to the passage of that bill. That fact, however, does not rest on any proof. You will remember also, Mr. Speaker, that in the time of John Adams he sent to the Senate a nomination for a high military office of an unworthy son-in-law of his own who had been detected in some breach of trust; the nomination of a man so unworthy that his own Secretary of War lobbied at the doors of the Senate Chamber to prevent his confirmation.

Now we hear from that class of persons called "independents" expressions of discontent. We hear it from the universities and from the scholars of the country. I rejoice that they are alert in regard to the evils of political administration; but, sir, the condemnation which came in former times from the same class could hardly be uttered upon this floor by any gentleman who desires to preserve his character for candor or moderation. I have in my possession (I wish I had it here) a copy of a poem delivered in 1803 by Mr. Brackett before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Dartmouth and published by a committee of which Ezekiel Webster, afterward one of the most celebrated men in the State of New Hampshire, was chairman. Mr. Brackett in that poem, amid the applause of the scholars gathered at the festival of that famous and learned university, draws a picture of the degradation of his country in the fifteenth year of its constitutional existence in vigorous strains worthy of Pope. He supposes the mighty shade of Washington to rise on the banks of the Potomac—

> His warm cheek glowed, and flashed his angry eyes;
> Then from his brow the laurel-wreath unbound,
> And threw the withering honors on the ground.

This is his portraiture of Jefferson, then President:

> Cimmerian goblins brooded o'er the hour
> When here a wild projector rose to power;

Delusive schemes distend whose plodding brain,
Whose philosophic robe debaucheries stain.
He, weak in rule, unskilled in moral lore,
In practice infidel, in spirit poor;
Despised in person, and debased in mind,
At once the curse and pity of mankind,
Pleased with his simple garb and sable whore,
Reviles the God his countrymen adore.
Refined in insult! There we saw him shed
Theatric sorrow o'er the mighty dead!
Oh, then, then Heaven's indignant thunders slept;
The shade was wounded, and the virtues wept!

Here is the picture of Albert Gallatin, that accomplished scholar and statesman, like Agassiz, one of the two great and costly gifts our sister-republic of Switzerland has given to America, as he seemed to contemporary eyes. Gallatin was then at the head of the Treasury.

Columbians! see, disgraced and drooping, stand
Your eagle, half unfledged by party's hand!
Columbians! see a foreign child of vice,
Vile leech of state, whose virtue 's avarice,
Sedition nursed and taught in faction's school,
With front of triple brass, your treasure rule!
Columbians! see the foes of virtue rise,
By slander mounted, and upheld by lies!
Columbians! see your veterans basely spurned,
Your heroes slighted, and your chiefs unmourned!
See! nor while merit from your board is driven,
Expect the favor of offended heaven.

The society of the Phi Beta Kappa return to the author their cordial thanks for his ingenious and sentimental poem and request a copy for publication.

This was the sentiment of Dartmouth in the fifteenth year of the Republic. It was not much different at Harvard.

I desire to read to the House some extracts from the writings of Fisher Ames, who retired from Congress during the administration of General Washington, and who represented the city of Boston, to show what he thought of the condition of the country at that time. He was chosen president of Harvard about the time these letters were written. I shall read only a few passages taken almost at random from his letters:

Our country is too big for union, too sordid for patriotism, too democratic for liberty. What is to become of it, He who made it best knows. Its vice will govern it by practicing upon its folly. This is ordained for democracies.

Then he goes on to say—

Property at public disposal is sure to corrupt. Here, to make the result equally inevitable and inveterate, power is also to be for some ages within the arbitrium of a house of representatives. Before that period Botany Bay will be a bettering-house for our public men. Our morals, forever sunning and fly-blown like fresh meat hung up in the election market, will taint the air like pestilence. Liberty, if she is not a goddess that delights in carnage, will choke in such an atmosphere, fouler than the vapor of death in a mine.

Again he says:

Suppose an attack on property, I calculate on the "sensibilities" of our nation. There is our sensorium. Like a negro's shins, there our patriotism would feel the kicks and twinge with agonies that we should not be able so much as to conceive of, if we only have our faces spit in. In this case we could wipe off the ignominy, and think no more of the matter. He that robs me of my good name takes trash. What is it but a little foul breath tainted from every sot's lungs? But he who takes my purse robs me of that which enriches him, instead of me, and therefore I will have vengeance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be misunderstood; I do not wish to be misrepresented in this matter. Let no man assert that I refer to the evils of those days as either excuse or palliation for the evil of ours. That generation was a frugal and honest generation in the main, and they would have visited with the swiftest condemnation and punishment, as this generation will visit with the swiftest condemnation and punishment, every breach of public trust, whether through dishonesty or usurpation. But they did not send to England for Benedict Arnold. They did not restore the tories to power. They did not go down on their knees to George III and ask him to take them back into favor. They believed that if the Constitution could not be administered honestly by a majority of the friends of the Constitution, it could not be administered honestly by a majority of its enemies; that if liberty was not safe and pure in the hands of those who loved her, then liberty was a failure upon the earth, and they did not think of intrusting her to the hands of those who hated her. So in this generation had they lived to-day they would have done simply what a distinguished president of the convention in my own State, whom the gentleman quotes, recommended; they would have taken the Government from the hands of the lovers of liberty who are dishonest and put it into the hands of men who entertain the same sentiments but who are honest. It would never have occurred to them that because among one hundred thousand men there are found some few who will not keep the eighth commandment, "Thou shalt not steal," which is a mandate for all the public service, they should put in power men who have no regard for the sixth, "Thou shalt not kill.

The gentleman has very frankly stated what I admit is the one most vital issue in the coming campaign. It is an issue which transcends all questions of finance, of economy, of vigor of administration, by as much as questions of freedom and human rights transcend all questions of mere property. It is an issue which the former slave-holding and rebel classes at the South deem so vital, that upon it they have impacted themselves together, as firmly united as they ever were in the interests of slavery, as thoroughly drilled and disciplined as were their best troops in the war. It is the question whether the policy which has been hitherto pursued toward the colored people of the South by the republican party shall be continued, whether the power of the nation shall be pledged to them for the protection of their rights, or whether they shall be left wholly to the mercy of the white democrats at the South when they have gained, as they hope to gain by such methods as they have pursued and are pursuing, the entire control of their State powers. This issue the democrats of the South deem so vital that they seem willing to risk all differences among themselves on other questions and to adopt any platform and support any candidate by whose aid they can hope to carry one or two northern States with votes enough to give them a President.

The American people had to choose between three policies in dealing with the four millions who had been emancipated by the war:

First. To restore without condition the rebel States to their old powers, leaving the negro to be dealt with by the former masters without interference from national authority.

Second. To keep the old States out of the Union, governing them as Territories until new generations, with new opinions and habits, had grown up to be intrusted with self-government.

Third. The policy in part adopted to confer by amendments to the Constitution of the United States citizenship and the right of suffrage on the enfranchised race, and impose upon Congress the power and duty of passing all needful laws for their protection.

The second of these alternatives, the keeping the States that had rebelled in subjection as Territories, is a plan which to-day finds few defenders. Nearly a majority of the people at the North regarded it as unconstitutional. Whether constitutional or not, it was utterly repugnant to the principles, the habits, and the character of the whole people. Eleven vassal States kept in subjection by governors civil or military, and a complete system of government appointed from without. Whatever effect this would have had on the governed, there can be no doubt that it would have been in the end utterly destructive to the governing States. There is no lesson taught more clearly by history than that the habit of wielding arbitrary power by one man over another or by one people over another tends to the injury of the men who wield it.

The only alternative left, therefore, was between the policy advocated by the gentleman and that actually pursued by the people of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I propose to contrast the policy adopted by the American people of dealing with the emancipated race with that which the democratic party would have adopted as evidenced by its conduct whenever it possessed either the legal or the physical power. I do not fear the comparison either of principles or of results.

Before bringing these two policies to the test of actual experience, let us consider what we ought to have expected beforehand from the known constitution of human nature. It is an old parliamentary adage, that "You should not put out the child to a nurse who would strangle it." The writers of the civil law warn us against committing a ward to a hostile guardian, tanquam agnum lupo ad devorandum.

I would not of course apply this maxim literally to any large class of my fellow-citizens. But to commit the rights of these men in freedom to men who thought their just and rightful condition was that of slaves, that the rights of these two million women should be left to those who thought it right to whip women, that the education of these children should depend on men who thought it right to sell little children, would hardly seem to be an act of political wisdom.

But let us bring to the test of actual experience the theories of the gentleman from Mississippi. We are able fortunately to know something of their fruits in legislation and something of their fruits in action. For a few years after the war the democrats of the South by the policy of Andrew Johnson were permitted to have uncontrolled possession of the legislative powers of several of the Southern States. One of them was the State of Mississippi. I hold in my hand a small but most remarkable volume, the public laws of Mississippi for the year 1865.

The gentleman sought to find some palliation for these odious laws by citing the opinions of Governor MORTON uttered in that year, that it was desirable to postpone for ten, fifteen, or twenty years the grant of the full elective franchise to the colored race. He would have it believed that Governor Andrew of Massachusetts held a like opinion. He is wholly mistaken as to Governor Andrew. Governor Andrew opposed the reconstruction of the South on the basis of the colored vote alone, and proposed to admit master and slave to the enjoyment of the franchise on the same terms, imposing on both alike an educational condition. He maintained that we must deal generously and with confidence with the men who had carried their States into rebellion, whom he termed "the natural leaders of that society." But the conduct of the Legislatures of Mississippi and the other States overturned all the theories of Governor MORTON, and struck a cruel blow in return for the confidence of Governor Andrew.

The opening sentence of the constitution of Mississippi declares—

That all freemen when they form a social compact are equal in rights.

I think it will be perceived that in the opinion of that Legislature the negro was not present when the social compact was made. They then proceed to provide, in article 8 of the constitution, that—

SECTION 1. The institution of slavery having been destroyed in the State of Mississippi, neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall hereafter exist in this State; and the Legislature at its next session, and thereafter as the public welfare may require, shall provide by law for the protection and security of the person and property of the freedmen of the State, and guard them and the State against any evils that may arise from their sudden emancipation.

Under that authority "to guard them—the freedmen—and the State against any evils that may arise from their sudden emancipation," be good enough, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, to listen to what they did. In the first place, on pages 82–86 of this volume is "An act to confer civil rights on freedmen, and for other purposes." In the first place, they enacted that no negro should own any real estate; he might own personal property; but no person should lease any real estate to a negro. He could not own in fee, nor have any interest as tenant, in any real estate. And then they go on and provide—

That every freedman, free negro, and mulatto shall, on the second Monday of January, 1866, and annually thereafter, have a lawful home or employment, and shall have written evidence thereof.

The same act then goes on to provide "that every civil officer shall, and every person may"—just listen to this, you who represent constituencies of northern laborers—

That every civil person shall, and every person may, arrest and carry back to his or her legal employer any freedman, free negro, or mulatto who shall have quit the service of his or her employer before the expiration of his or her service without good cause, and said officer and person shall be entitled to receive for arresting and carrying back every deserting employé aforesaid the sum of $5, and ten cents per mile from the place of arrest to the place of delivery; and the same shall be paid by the employer and held as a set-off against the wages of said deserting employé.

Then, upon affidavit made by the employer before any justice of the peace that his servant has left him without good cause, the negro is to be seized, brought before the justice of the peace, and trial is to be had; and from the judgment of the justice either party may appeal to the county court, and the justice may commit the negro to the custody of the employer in the mean time until that appeal is settled.

Section 9 of the same act provides—

That if any person shall persuade or attempt to persuade, entice or cause any freedmen, free negro, or mulatto to desert from the legal employment of any person before the expiration of his or her term of employment, or shall knowingly employ any such deserting freedmen, free negro, or mulatto, or shall knowingly give or sell to any such freedman, free negro, or mulatto any food, raiment, or other thing, he or she shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be fined not less than $25 and not more than $200 and costs; and if said fine and costs shall not be immediately paid, the court shall sentence such convict to not exceeding two months' imprisonment in the county jail, and he or she shall morever be liable to the party injured in damages.

And here is a further act to amend the vagrant laws of the State. The act, in its second section, provides—

That all freedmen, free negroes, and mulattoes in this State over the age of eighteen years, found on the second Monday in January, 1866, or thereafter, with no lawful employment or business—

If he is out of work even; that is all that is required—

or found unlawfully assembling themselves together either in the day or night-time—

And by a later statute it is expressly enacted that all the old laws relating to slavery shall be applicable to freedmen; so that the holding of a political meeting or any other meeting is an unlawful act under this law—and all white persons so assembling with freedmen, or usually associating with freedmen, free negroes, or mulattoes on terms of equality, * * * shall be deemed vagrants, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in the sum of not exceeding, in the case of a freedman, free negro, or mulatto, $50, and a white man, $200, and imprisoned at the discretion of the court, the free negro not exceeding ten days, and the white man not exceeding six months.

So that, under the authority to pass laws to guard the freedmen against any evils that may arise from their sudden emancipation, the white men of Mississippi enact that any white man who associates with a free black citizen on terms of equality is to be deemed a vagrant, and punished by fine and imprisonment; and I am not so sure that, so far as the authors of that law were concerned, it was not a wise law, so far as the morals, honesty, and fitness for citizenship of the negro were concerned, to exclude them from his society.

Then there is another act providing—

That no freedman, free negro, or mulatto, not in the military service of the United States Government, and not licensed so to do by the board of police of his or her county, shall keep or carry fire-arms.

And the penalty is $10 and costs; and any white person who shall sell, lend, or give to any freedman, free negro, or mulatto any fire-arms is to be subject to fine and imprisonment.

Now, by the uniform confession of the white democrats of the South, their homes during the war were guarded by these same freedmen, then slaves, and they were guilty of no disturbance, no act of violence, no outrage. They therefore could not have supposed that they were in any danger by permitting these freedmen to have arms. But it was that the negro should not be recognized as enjoying that first constitutional prerogative of the free citizens of this Republic, the right to bear arms, that this law was enacted. Then there is this further provision in the same law:

That all the penal and criminal laws now in force in this State defining offenses and prescribing the mode of punishment for crimes and misdemeanors committed by slaves, free negroes, and mulattoes, be, and the same are hereby, re-enacted and declared to be in full force and effect against freedmen, free negroes, and mulattoes, except so far as the mode and manner of trial and punishment have been changed or altered by law.

And the act further provides—

That if any freedman, free negro, or mulatto, convicted of any of the misdemeanors provided against in this act—

Including the crime of being out of work—

shall fail or refuse, for the space of five days after conviction, to pay the fine and costs imposed, such person shall be hired out by the sheriff or other officer, at public outcry, to any white person who will pay the said fine and costs and take such convict for the shortest time.

And there is no limit as to the time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HEREFORD in the chair.) The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the time of the gentleman will be extended.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended. How much additional time does he want?

Mr. HOAR. I cannot tell exactly. I will get through as soon as I possibly can.

There was no objection, and an extension of time was accordingly granted.

Mr. HOAR. Now remember that all these laws were passed in Mississippi before there was conferred on these freedmen any political powers. They were not the result of bad government. They embodied the ideas which the southern democrats then entertained of what was just and right in carrying out in good faith the amendment of the Constitution prohibiting slavery. This was the action of these men toward a class of their fellow-citizens whom their own constitution declared to be free.

I should like to take the sense of the workingmen of any northern State this summer as to what they think of the fitness for rule in the Republic of a party that proposes to sell free citizens for the crime of being out of work.

These laws in substance were copied in the State of Louisiana. I have the Louisiana laws here, but will not read them. They were substantially copied in Texas, and I think in Georgia and several other southern States.

In the same year Mississippi rejected the thirteenth amendment; so that they desired to preserve slavery in Kentucky, Maryland, Delaware, and Missouri.

Truly—

Thy gentleness hath made thee great.

I now wish to call attention to one other matter. I will ask the Clerk to read an extract from a report made by Hon. Luke P. Poland, who my friends on the other side will concede to be one of the most candid, impartial, and just men we have ever had in public life. The report relates to a time before any carpet-bag governments were established in the South. I ask the Clerk to read the paragraphs I have marked.

This is the account of a transaction in the State of Louisiana in 1864.

The Clerk read as follows:

In 1864 a convention was held which framed the constitution of the State. It adjourned subject to the call of its president. In 1866 it was summoned to meet again in New Orleans, to consider some proposed amendments to the constitution, which had gone into effect. It was claimed that by the adoption of the constitution its functions were exhausted, and that its future assembling could have no official character. If this were true it would seem to have been harmless.

Its members were unarmed and unprepared for resistance. This body was set upon in the hall where it assembled by a mob consisting of citizens and policemen of New Orleans. In the language of the report of the congressional committee of the House of 1866, who fully investigated the whole transaction, "There has been no occasion in our national history when a riot has occurred so destitute of justifiable cause, resulting in a massacre so inhuman and fiend-like. The massacre was begun and finished at midday. An intention to disperse and slaughter the members of the convention and those persons, white and black, who were present and friendly to its purposes, was mercilessly carried into full effect." The police were active on the side of the rioters. Two hundred and sixty persons were killed. The report proceeds:

"The committee examined seventy-four persons as to the facts of violence and bloodshed upon that day. It is in evidence that men who were in the hall, terrified by the merciless attacks of the armed police, sought safety by jumping from the windows, a distance of twenty feet, to the ground, and as they jumped were shot by police or citizens. Some, disfigured by wounds, fought their way down stairs to the street, to be shot or beaten to death on the pavement. Colored persons at distant points in the city, peaceably pursuing their lawful business, were attacked by the police, shot and cruelly beaten. Men of character and position, some of whom were members and some spectators of the convention, escaped from the hall covered with wounds and blood, and were preserved almost by miracle from death. Scores of colored citizens bear frightful scars, more numerous than many soldiers of a dozen well-fought fields can show, proofs of fearful danger and strange escape. Men were shot while waving handkerchiefs in token of surrender and submission. White men and black, with arms uplifted praying for life, were answered by shot and blow from knife and club; the bodies of some were 'pounded to a jelly;' a colored man was dragged from under a street-crossing and killed at a blow; men concealed in out-houses and among piles of lumber were eagerly sought for and slaughtered or maimed without remorse; the dead bodies upon the street were violated by shot, kick, and stab; the face of a man 'just breathing his last' was gashed by a knife or razor in the hands of a woman; an old gray-haired man peaceably walking the street at a distance from the institute was shot through the head; negroes were taken out of their houses and shot; a policeman riding in a buggy deliberately fired his revolver from the carriage into a crowd of colored men; a colored man two miles away from the convention hall was taken from his shop by the police, at about four o'clock on the afternoon of the riot, and shot and wounded in side, hip, and back. One man was wounded by fourteen blows, shots, and stabs; the body of another received seven pistol-balls. After the slaughter had measurably ceased carts, wagons, and drays, driven through the streets, gathered the dead, the dying, and the wounded in 'promiscuous loads,' a policeman, in some cases, riding in the wagon, seated upon the living men beneath him. The wounded men, taken at first to the station-house or lock-up, were all afterward carried to the hospital. While at the station-houses, until friends found them with medical aid, they were left to suffer; when at the hospital they were attended to with care and skill. But this was done at no cost to the city or to the State.

"Without asking permission, so far as the committee learned, those wounded men were carried to the hospital under the care of the Freedmen's Bureau and shelter, surgical treatment, and food were furnished at the cost of the United States.

"In the year 1868 occurred in Louisiana six bloody and terrible massacres. Mr. Poland reports that more than two thousand persons were killed in that State within a few weeks of the presidential election. In the parish of Saint Landry the republicans had a registered majority of 1,071 votes. In the spring of 1868 they carried the parish by 678 votes. In the fall they gave Grant no vote, not one, while the democrats cast 4,787 for Seymour. Here occurred one of the bloodiest riots on record. The Ku-Klux killed and wounded over two hundred republicans, hunting and chasing them for two days and nights through fields and swamps. Thirteen captives were taken from the jail and shot. A pile of twenty-five dead bodies were found half buried in the woods. Having conquered the republicans, killed and driven off the white leaders, the Ku-Klux captured the negroes, marked them with badges of red flannel, enrolled them in clubs, led them to the polls, made them vote the democratic ticket, and then gave them certificates of the fact."

Mr. Speaker, this was before all bad government of carpet-baggers or negroes. It was without other cause than the desire to carry an election and to give an illustration of the meaning of the gentleman's maxim—

Thy gentleness hath made thee great.

I will not detain the House by a recital of the terrible murder at Colfax in 1873, a deed which our report pronounces—

Without palliation or justification; deliberate, barbarous, cold-blooded murder, to stand like the massacre of Glencoe or of St. Bartholomew, a foul blot on the page of history.

Thy gentleness hath made thee great.

In 1874 took place an election for State officers and members of the Legislature. I ask to have the history of the transactions of that year read by the clerk, as given by myself in the report just cited.

The Clerk read as follows:

We now come to the events of 1874. The campaign was inaugurated by the formation of a party designed to divide the people of Louisiana on the line of race. Its convention at Baton Rouge begins its address, "We, the white men of Louisiana." This party assumed various names in various localities, almost always indicating a purpose to make the race issue distinct.

Agreements were entered into in various parishes, signed by hundreds of planters, to employ no laborer who did not vote their ticket. Hand-bills like the following were circulated in French and English:

"Louisianois: Pour sauver votre patrie, il faut renvoyer les nègres. (Par la faim, animal le plus féroce est dompté.")

"Louisianians: To save your country, do not employ the negro. Wild beasts can only be tamed by hunger."

After the white-league rising of September 14, 1874, an account of which is given hereafter, risings took place in many parishes. The Kellogg officers were driven from power and compelled to fly for their lives. After the re-establishment of the Kellogg government in some cases the officers were not permitted to resume their functions.

The speeches at public meetings and leading articles in the press urged the people to deeds of violence. We submit a collection of extracts taken from many leading and influential journals published in various parts of the State. We have not space to make extracts from them in this report. They are enough of themselves to establish its conclusions as to the purposes and conduct of the leaders of the white man's party in the campaign of 1874.

It is impossible to state, in the space which this report can properly cover, the details of the deeds of lawless violence which were proved before the committee. In many parishes the legal officers were driven out by force. Republicans were murdered or compelled to fly for their lives. Whatever the pretext, the real offense was their political opinions.

Buford Blunt, State senator, an eminent and influential colored preacher in the Baptist Church, whose efforts to establish schools in the parish are highly spoken of in the report of the State superintendent of education, was compelled to promise to give up all politics, and afterward to fly for his life.

Allen Greene, a State senator, a native of Georgia, who had lived in the State for many years, had established in the parish of Lincoln a tannery and shoe manufactory. Hides and bark were produced in abundance in the neighborhood. Mr. Greene had furnished machinery which required the employment of skilled labor, and had introduced about eighty workmen from New England, to whom he paid an average of $30 per month, making a pay-roll of $2,500 per month to be expended in the town. In May, 1874, Mr. Greene was required to resign his office, with threats against his life. His workmen were so disturbed by the condition of things that they refused to remain, and a new body, who had been engaged in Massachusetts, hearing of the rising of September 14, refused to keep their engagements. Thus the people of the parish of Lincoln prefer to send their hides half way across the continent, have them tanned and manufactured into boots and shoes in Massachusetts, by workmen to whom the flour, sugar, rice, and cotton are in like manner conveyed, and then brought back to Louisiana in the form of boots and shoes, and to pay tribute to the manufacturer in Massachusetts, to the carrier and commission-merchant, rather than to allow manufactures to be carried on in their own State by men who may be allowed the free expression of their political opinions.

THE STORY OF JUDGE MYERS.

H. C. Myers resides in the parish of Natchitoches, about five hundred miles above the city of New Orleans, on Red River; has lived there eighteen years. His wife and their six children were born there. For several years he was register of the United States land office for the northwestern district of Louisiana; was elected parish judge in 1870 and 1872, which position he held until February, 1874, when he was appointed judge of the seventeenth judicial district of that State, comprising the parishes of Natchitoches, Sabine, De Soto, and Red River. He appears to be a man of good education, of culture, of refined speech and manners; and your committee fail to see that any charge of mal or misfeasance in office was at all sustained. Early in the spring of 1874 there were nursed and assiduously cultivated in that parish fierce and clamorous political antagonisms. The White League was organized, the removal of all republican office-holders determined upon, and, as has been well said of another locality, "the air was full of assassination." In May notices were posted in conspicuous places, as follows:

"K. K. K."

"Boullet, Myers, and all other radicals in this parish. Your fate is scaled. Nothing but your blood will appease us. The people of Natchitoches, Sabine, Winn, De Soto, Rapides, Red River, Bienville, Claiborne, Jackson, and Caddo are ready at a moment's notice, and will exterminate all radicals."

About this time Judge Myers was warned that his life would be forfeited if he remained another day at his home. His wife, two of his children, and his aged father were sick; one of the children and the father hopelessly; so says the judge. "Quite sick; my little child dying; my aged father, at the other end of the town, also dying. I kissed my little baby, placed it in the care of its weary mother and the Almighty. I left my home, not daring even to visit my father."

The judge and Judge Boullet fled in the night-time by circuitous paths, without even a change of clothing, lest it might lead to suspicion, and finally arrived at New Orleans. From that day to now he has never ventured to his home, and dares not do so. In less than a week after he left the babe died, and the father, too, and says the wife in her testimony, "I was left alone with my sick and dying children. None of my neighbors came to my assistance. My child died. I sent to the tomb-builder to make its little tomb, and he being a democrat refused to do it." From the testimony of the judge and his wife, and incidentially of others, your committee are compelled to believe this a true story.

We were anxious to obtain the facts in the terrible tragedy of Coushatta, and were able to do so from several witnesses, but principally from Mr. Twitchell, a brother of one of the victims, and from Mr. Abney, a merchant of that town, whose reluctant admissions, under a rigid cross-examination, satisfied us was the chief conspirator. This is the fearful story proven to our satisfaction:

The Twitchell brothers, from New Hampshire, both young and active men of business, one a man some time married, the other but a short time before his death, with five or six other men from the North, with their families, settled in this little town, bringing with them earnestness of purpose, integrity, economy, and habits of industry. The reasonably-expected results followed: The hamlet grew into a prosperous and flourishing New England village, with its saw and grist mills, its factory, its stores and store-houses, its pleasant white-painted houses with their lawns and gardens, its churches and school-houses. Business flourished. About twelve hundred colored men were gathered into the village. Their labor was in demand; their wages good and promptly paid. Their children eagerly availed themselves of the school privileges abundantly afforded. The colored voters finding that these men never betrayed their confidence, but in all things were aiding them, elected them to the several parish offices; and they, thus elected, from a sense of duty, honestly and faithfully administered the same. Everything in the village was prosperous, peaceable, and happy. But there was there a small party of white conservatives, headed by Mr. Abney, who determined to rule, who acknowledged no right to the black man but that of service, who had no feeling toward their white neighbors recognizing in the black a citizen other than intense jealousy and hatred.

The usual result followed. August 25, 1874, these officers were waited upon and ordered to resign; they declined; then they were informed that death alone was the alternative. Knowing that the inexorable decree had gone forth, that nothing, neither service to the town, to the State, to their neighbors, nor the faithful performance of duty, nor virtue, nor integrity, nor prayers of themselves, of wives, or little children could save, they besought their cruel neighbors to send them in safety out of the State, promising never to return. An escort was raised by this man Abney of twenty mounted men. The prisoners, taking all of their ready money, about $2,000, placed themselves in the hands of the guards. Abney issued military orders to what he called political clubs, but we believe white-leaguers, along the route to furnish aid, supplies, &c. The march was commenced, and, within thirty miles of their homes, these prisoners were all murdered, terribly mutilated, buried, and no father, widow, brother, or son was permitted even to visit their graves until the bodies were decomposed. None of the white man's party have ever sought the murderers; no pursuit has ever been made, no inquiries ever set on foot by them. A man riding one of the horses of one of the dead men has been seen in the parish, but no one arrested his course or asked him about the bloody deed. No republican, white or black, has dared to commence proceedings. Abney was arrested and admitted to bail in a small sum, and with impunity insults the majesty of outraged law by boldly appearing as a witness before this committee. More, he was introduced by the conservatives to the witness-stand with a flourish of trumpets as a leading merchant of that section of the State. A brief extract from his cross-examination will indicate his connection with the crime:

"Mr. FRYE. Was there not one other officer at that time requested to resign?
"Mr. ABNEY. Yes.
"Mr. FRYE. What was his name?
"Mr. ABNEY. Scott.
"Mr. FRYE. Was he killed?
"Mr. ABNEY. No.
"Mr. FRYE. Did he go with your guard?
"Mr. ABNEY. No.
"Mr. FRYE. Why not?
"Mr. ABNEY. I wouldn't let him; I compelled him to remain behind.
"Mr. FRYE. Was he a master-mason?
"Mr. ABNEY. Yes.
"Mr. FRYE. Were you a master-mason?
"Mr. ABNEY. Yes.
"Mr. FRYE. Were any others of the persons masons?
"Mr. ABNEY. I did not know that they were."

Now, against those murdered men no crime was charged, no dishonesty alleged, no malfeasance in office proved. Abney alone said they had cheated in certain contracts, but your committee gave no credit whatever to his testimony.

Thus by the murderous hands of neighbors, of men who pride themselves upon their position in society, of those who had never received from the victims other than kindness, were these men deliberately slain. And there is practically no law in Louisiana to bring them to punishment.

WHITE LEAGUE.

The White League is an organization which exists in New Orleans, and contains at least from twenty-five hundred to three thousand members, armed, drilled, and officered as a military organization. Organizations bearing the same name extend throughout many parts of the State. It was pretended that this organization in the city was simply as a volunteer police force, the regular police being inefficient; that it has no connection with associations of the same name in other parts of the State, and that these latter are large political clubs without military organization or arms. A brief examination and a brief cross-examination effectually dispelled this pretension. Several of its members and officers were examined before the committee. So far as was shown, this organization in no single instance performed police functions. Its organization, equipment, drill, and discipline were wholly military. Its name was not appropriate to a volunteer police, but was appropriate to an association designed to put the whites of the State into power by force. It had cannon. On the 14th of September, 1874, it rose upon and attacked the police of the city, the pretext of the attack being the seizure of arms which it had imported from the North, and, having defeated them with considerable slaughter, it took possession of the State-house, overthrew the State government, and installed a new governor in office, and kept him in power until the United States interfered. This rising was planned beforehand. Its commanding officer, Ogden, published an elaborate and pompous report of his military movements, in which he expresses his thanks to his aids and other officers for their important and valuable services before and during the day of the action. In other parts of the State organizations under the same name existed, and we have no doubt that their purposes and methods were also identical. In one parish their meetings were called by notices, headed, "Attention, White League," and signed by an officer in his military capacity. Abney, the leader of the band at Coushatta, when he sent off the republican prisoners under a guard, gave a military order for supplies and guard to the highest officer of a club in another town, on obedience to which, if his story were true, the safety of the lives of the prisoners depended. Yet he professed to have no other power than that of president of an ordinary democratic club addressing the president of a subordinate or branch club of the same organization.

The White League of New Orleans itself was and is a constant menace to the republicans of the whole State. Its commander can, in a few hours, place bodies of men, armed and drilled, in any of the near parishes, or those on the coast, or into Mississippi, Alabama, or Texas. It doubtless contains many persons of property and influence. It also contains many persons of very different character. It would be desirous and able to overthrow the State government at any time, if not prevented by the power of the United States. They still retain more than one thousand stand of arms, taken from the State on September 14 and never returned.

We cannot doubt that the effect of all these things was to prevent a full, free, and fair election and to intimidate the colored voters and the white republicans. The very formation of a white man's party was a menace of terrible import to those who remembered Colfax and Bossier and the convention. .The press was filled with threats of violence. The agreement to discharge laborers, the suggestion that wild beasts are tamed by hunger, was evidence of the same spirit. The overthrow of the State government by the White League on the 14th of September; the turning out large numbers of parish officials in the country, compelling them to flee for their lives; the fearful lesson of Coushatta; the formation, arming, and drilling of the White League, the natural successors of the Knights of the White Camelia; these things in a community where there is no legal punishment for political murder must, in the nature of things, have filled with terror a people timid and gentle like the colored population of Louisiana, even if we had not taken abundant evidence as to special acts of violence and crime and their effects on particular neighborhoods.

Mr. Moncure, the conservative candidate for State treasurer, claims a majority in the whole State of about five thousand. A far greater number of republicans than enough to overcome this majority must have been prevented from registration or driven by terror from the polls.

In view of these facts, we do not hesitate to find that the election of 1874 was neither full, free, nor fair; that in large portions of the State the usual means of instructing and persuading the people, of organizing and conducting a campaign, could not be carried on by republicans without danger to their lives; and that many more voters than were needed to give the republican party a complete victory were prevented from voting at all or coerced into voting the white man's ticket.

Mr. HOAR. Truly

Thy gentleness hath made thee great.

I am not to be frightened or ridiculed when I discuss these things by the taunt from any quarter that it is "shaking the bloody shirt." When the garment, however humble or mean, is drenched with the heart's blood of an American citizen I have but one question to put to my country, Anne hæc vestis filii tui?—Know you if this be your son's garment?

I agree with the gentleman that the union of nearly all the blacks in one political party, and of nearly all the whites in another, is a fact deeply to be deplored. Party spirit bears evil fruit in abundance when animosities of race and class do not mingle with it. But I cannot doubt that whether the white republican leaders have sought to foster this discussion on the color line or not, it would long since have disappeared if the leaders of the white people of Louisiana had not hammered and welded together the masses of the colored population by a system of conduct calculated to excite in the highest degree their fears for their freedom, or their political and social rights.

The people who would persuade us, and to some degree persuade themselves, that they are willing to give the negro all his rights under the Constitution seem to lose all their understanding of what justice and equality really mean when the negro is concerned. They think, and very justly, that it is a great evil to mass all the colored votes on one side. It never occurs to them that it is an equal evil to mass all the white votes on the other. On the contrary, their animosity is specially directed against those whites who act with negroes. They have little reprobation for those leaders who advise the whites to band together in an agreement not to employ negro laborers who vote the radical ticket, or for the planters who followed the advice. The life of no man would be safe, as one of their witnesses very frankly admitted, who, when it was time to gather the cotton-crop, should advise negroes to refuse to work for planters who are not republicans. The white who kills a negro goes unpunished. A fearful vengeance overtakes the negro who snaps a cap at a white man. In parish after parish the whites turn out public officers whom they dislike by force, and no punishment follows. The assembling of a body of negroes at the command of the sheriff to maintain his lawful authority is followed by the Colfax massacre.

Southern gentlemen speak with contempt of persons whom they term "carpet-baggers." The Constitution gives to every American citizen the right to choose his home anywhere on American soil and to take such part in public affairs as his fellow-citizens shall assign to him. Shall not the American citizen born on our soil have the rights to which we gladly welcome natives of other lands? It is not to the carpet-bag, but that it is held in American hands, that the southern democrat objects.

The gentleman will perhaps claim that the opinions of his class at the South have changed since these laws were passed, and since some of these outrages were committed. If they have not changed, surely no man will be bold enough to say that the rights of the colored people would be safe for an instant if they were placed within the power of that class. But admit that they have changed and that they are now reconciled in opinion to the abolition of slavery and to the equality of all persons before the law and in the rights of citizenship. Ah, Mr. Speaker, that is a fatal admission. What tribute could be grander, what concession more complete, to the success of the republican policy of reconstruction than to confess that it has resulted in a change of sentiment like that.

Will the gentleman from Mississippi claim that he does not now think that it is a misfortune that the rebellion did not succeed, that it was a misfortune that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments were adopted, and that this belief is not shared by his political associates? If this be his belief and theirs, they would be strange guardians of the rights of the race which these amendments emancipated. But if this be not his belief and theirs, I point to their conversion as the most triumphant evidence of the wisdom and the success of that policy which, while it has raised four millions from slavery to citizenship, has in ten years eradicated from the understandings and the hearts of the white people of fifteen States the prejudices of centuries.

Errors in administration, mistakes in finance, extravagances in expenditures, confidence unworthily bestowed—these have been the lot of all parties in the past, and will doubtless be repeated in the future. Even dishonesty and corruption have existed in all parties. They must, in the nature of the case, be practiced but by a few, and will be cured in a free government, whatever party may be in power, by the people whose resources and industries they burden without distinction of party. But to have changed the opinions and conquered the prejudices of a people angered by defeat, imbittered by years of bloody war, so that they have become reconciled to the policy and convinced of the justice of raising their former slaves, men of another color and another race, to civil and political equality with themselves, this is a triumph of administration glorious and splendid, to which history can furnish no parallel; compared with which the laurels that a Cæsar reaps are weeds.

Mr. Speaker, I do not deny that in all these years the democrats of the South have made some progress. But it has been a progress in which nothing has been due to themselves. Whatever they have learned, either of freedom, of justice, or of republican government, they have learned from their opponents.

They have been the unwilling pupils of the republican party. Like Dante's souls, whose necks Satan had twisted, they have marched on impelled by a strength other than their own, perpetually looking back.

So much, Mr. Speaker, for democratic legislation in the matter of reconstruction. It shows a concerted, crafty scheme to reduce the negro to a system of peonage which degraded him below the condition of slavery, but imposed no corresponding obligation upon the master. This legislation, cruel and hateful as it is, is mercy itself compared with the conduct of southern democrats to the negro when freed from the restraints of the Federal power. I have given a few specimens, not because I desire to revive or preserve their odious or painful memory, but because they bear with terrible weight upon the issue now presented to the American people.

The republican party, in my judgment, in prescribing the conditions upon which the States of the South should be re-admitted were guilty of one serious omission. Recognizing and affirming in their State constitutions, as the people of every northern State have done, that a system of universal education is absolutely essential to the success of a system of universal suffrage, they committed the folly, the fatuity, of imposing by national authority upon the South, with their four millions of freedmen just freed from slavery and a still larger number of ignorant whites, a system of universal suffrage, making no provision for education. But by the Bureau of Education and by religious and charitable organizations and private aid we have done much in that direction.

All the teachings of the Old and New Testament are summed up by the Author of our religion in two simple and sublime commandments, on which hang all the law and the prophets. The great philosopher of our day, in one homely and noble verse, has expressed the whole of republican government in a space as brief:

The noble craftsman we promote,
Disown the knave and fool;
Each honest man shall have his vote,
Each child shall have his school.
For what avail
The plow and sail,
Or land, or life,
If freedom fail?

The gentleman makes eloquent but vague charges against the existing administration for its conduct in relation to the Southern States. What one act of the Government gives him just cause of complaint? Does he now dare to insist on his objection to either of the three great amendments to the Constitution? He has ventured no such objection in this debate. Does he deny that Congress has power to enforce them? If he admits the power the duty in proper cases follows. Does he place himself on record as complaining of the policy or purpose of the legislation of 1871, by which the homes of his colored fellow-citizens throughout the South were protected from outrages such as moved the indignation of Reverdy Johnson? He will scarcely make that issue to-day. Does he deny that it is the duty of the United States to guarantee to all the States a republican government, and on constitutional demand to protect the lawful governments of the States against lawless insurrection? If he does he must repudiate the original Constitution as well as the amendments. The only reproach he utters against the Government is that the State governments for which it interfered were badly administered. But the United States is bound to support all lawful State governments against insurrection without considering their administration. The vital difference between the gentleman and the republican party is that he seems to think that the remedy for what he dislikes in government is resistance by force. His logic would lead to the result that you are to vote against a State administration only when you like it, and revolt against it and attack its adherents with knife and pistol when you do not like it.

The gentlemen quoted from a report of which I was the author a statement that the President had based his interference in Louisiana on the unlawful order of a judge. I think the assignment of that reason a grave error on the part of the President. I now admit, as I declared in the report, that the order of that judge was entitled to no respect whatsoever, and that the assignment of that reason tended naturally and inevitably to influence existing discontents and to make the democrats of Louisiana believe that no better reason existed. But the report also declared that in our judgment Kellogg was lawfully elected; that the difficulty in ascertaining the truth was caused by the frauds of his opponents and their destruction or carrying off the returns. It was in our judgment the constitutional duty of the President to recognize and support Governor Kellogg. The whole of his error, which the gentleman from Mississippi dwells on as a justification or palliation for the acts of lawless violence, was the assignment of an unsound reason for the performance of his clear sworn duty.

The two systems of dealing with the colored race are these:

The republican party sets them free and secures their freedom by the Constitution itself.

The democratic party would have left slavery to exist in Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, and Delaware.

The republican policy secures them equality before the law.

The democrats sent white men to the penitentiary who associated with them on terms of equality.

The republican policy pledged to them the whole power of the National Government to protect their homes from the Ku-Klux Klan.

The democrat left it to the judgment of the Ku-Klux Klan to determine when its outrages should cease.

The republican policy made them freemen, citizens, voters; while the democratic would have left them peons.

Mr. Speaker, there is another evidence of the wisdom of the American people in conferring the rights of freemen upon the colored people to which I think neither the House nor the country will be insensible. During the past seven years there have sat in this Hall an average of seven colored Representatives. Most of them had been slaves, deprived by the laws under which they were born of the right to learn to read, to attend public meetings, or to avail themselves of any of the common methods of obtaining information concerning public affairs. All of them came from humble places in life. Yet what equal number of members of this House can be chosen on any principle of selection that will stand higher, either for fidelity, wisdom, or propriety in the discharge of their high duties. Who can cite an instance of an improper utterance in speech or of an undignified or unbecoming act of a colored Representative? What colored man has been compelled to suppress from the official reports any angry or intemperate utterances which have come from his heart in the heat of debate? Have the memories of ages of cruel oppression endured by their race—have the terrible cruelties of recent days wrung from their lips a single expression of hatred, or led them to urge on their political friends, who held the Government by such large majorities, a single measure of revenge?

They have had to meet the most unexpected emergencies and encounter the most formidable antagonists. The gentleman from New York, perhaps the most trained and experienced debater in this House, has not forgotten how in the Congress before the last the gentleman from South Carolina with equal courtesy and dexterity left him unhorsed and on his back in the sight of the House and the whole country. When the able gentleman from Georgia, the late vice-president of the southern confederacy, made his most powerful and carefully prepared speech to the last House on southern affairs, he was replied to on the instant by another colored Representative. It is no disparagement to the gentleman from Georgia to say, that in dignity, in ability, in constitutional argument, the speech of Mr. Elliott was in no wise inferior to that to which it was a reply. I mean no disrespect to anybody when I declare that the policy which gave to the loyal slave his right to be represented or to be a Representative here is as fully vindicated by its results as that which gave the rebel master the same rights.

Mr. Speaker, I have said much that I have been constrained to utter in this debate with great reluctance and pain. The gentleman from Mississippi undertook to cite in his speech from a report of which I had the honor to be the author, extracting only such admissions as he could find in its pages against the conduct of my political associates, while he was wholly silent in regard to the terrible arraignment made not by the report, but by the historic facts which it cites against the party to which he belongs. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi made a fatal and grievous error. If he and a few of his associates, North and South, would give the same manly utterance of condemnation against men who seek to accomplish political results by murder and assassination that has come from republican lips against republican misgovernment, the whole evils which distract that fair portion of our country would be over in a month. I had the honor in that report to say, and I repeat it now:

> The public sentiment of the rest of the country, more potent than any legislation, might stop the whole trouble in a month. If instead of seeking to gain partisan advantage from evils which are ruining this fair State, the two parties of the North would each resolutely set its face against the evil done by its own side, little would remain for Congress or President. The difficulty of the southern problem would have disappeared long ago if the democratic party of the North had given it to be clearly understood that they would have no political association with men who would commit, tolerate, extenuate, or overlook murder; and the republican party of the North had been unanimous in making it understood with equal emphasis that they would have no affiliation with men who would plunder the public for personal gain.

Mr. Speaker, I hate for any purpose to revive these odious and painful memories. Whatever oppressions have been suffered have been suffered by my countrymen. Whatever crimes have been committed have been committed by my countrymen. But we cannot discharge our own official duty, the American people cannot wisely exercise its high functions of self-government without a knowledge of the facts of our own history, however grievous and humiliating. I believe the wisdom of the people will find a peaceful and constitutional remedy for these evils whether of administration or lawless outrage. I do not agree with the gentleman from Mississippi that that remedy is to deliver the innocent into the power of the guilty, or that Congress should lay down its high functions to prevent crime at the demand of the criminals.

Do the democrats of the South who are concealing, apologizing for, abetting these crimes reflect that they are educating their young men to become a generation of assassins? Mr. BOUTWELL says in his report:

> The committee find that the young men of the State, especially those who reached manhood during the war or who have arrived at that condition since the war, constitute the nucleus and the main force of the dangerous element.

Do the democracy of the North reflect that they are seeking to obtain power, not by a fair election, but by the aid of the votes of States in which their party is an armed conspiracy organized to overthrow freedom of election, and that their success is to substitute for the Constitution of the United States the principles and the practices of Mexico?

The duty of the people is plain. Punish crime; punish corruption; unmask hypocrisy. But trust liberty only in the hands of her friends, and let the Constitution of your country be administered and defended by those who love it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate further insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BAYARD.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2041) to amend section 2291 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 3392) for the relief of John R. Harrington; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3856) for the relief of William H. French jr., United States Army, late an Indian agent at Crow Creek, Dakota.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 795) to enable Moses Marshall to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of letters-patent for improvement in knitting-machines; and

A bill (S. No. 796) for the relief of the heirs of Sheldon S. Hartshorn.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 779) to provide for the sale of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

POLITICAL CONDITION OF THE SOUTH.

Mr. HOOKER. In the absence of my colleague, Mr. LAMAR——

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from Mississippi will permit me to say before he proceeds that I took the pains to say to Mr. LAMAR some days ago that it was my purpose to reply to him, and yesterday to indicate to him that probably I would have the opportunity to do it to-day. I was very sorry he could not be here.

Mr. HOOKER. In the absence of my colleague, [Mr. LAMAR,] in reply to whose speech the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts in great part have been addressed, I feel it my duty, though coming into the House to-day with no expectation whatever of participating in this discussion, in his absence to say something. And more especially, Mr. Speaker, do I feel this incumbent upon me because while the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts may be considered as referring to the entire South, they have been confined in a very large degree to the action and conduct and legislative proceedings of my own State.

I came into the Hall while the gentleman from Massachusetts was speaking, and while I suppose from what occurred on yesterday that his object was to reply to the speech of my colleague, the sentiments which were then falling from him would not have indicated to an ordinary listener what the particular topic was which engaged the attention of the House and to which the gentleman from Massachusetts had arisen to speak. For he was then digging up the events of the past extending back to the administration of Washington, and the great and powerful men who were gathered around that administration.

He was seeking out with sedulous zeal the black spots wherever he thought they existed in the characters of the prominent men of the nation and the country to which he says he is proud to belong. He was holding them up to the gaze of the House and through your records to the gaze of the country as evidences of the fact that corruption had always existed in the Government, even back to the days of Washington and his administration; I suppose in order to induce his listeners to draw the inference that the corruption which had been exposed by the investigations of this House, the frauds upon the people, the peculations upon the Treasury, which had existed in his own party for the last fifteen years, might find some justification and some excuse in the history which he was thus narrating. I leave the gentleman from Massachusetts and the party to which he belongs the honor of this ghoul-like digging into the graves of the great men who have lived and died before us; and I hope that he and they will enjoy the gratification of feeling that this presentation of what he is pleased to term the corruption and the dishonor of his own country has fitly come from the party that in this age and in this centennial period has culminated in those qualities which he is seeking to defend. I envy him not the lesson which he draws from this. I envy him not the evident purpose for which he has drawn it, to vindicate the social standing and the moral position of the party to which he belongs.

The greater portion of the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, as I have before remarked, refers to the action of the Southern States generally with reference to the condition of the freed people immediately after the war. It is asserted that there is a feeling of hostility in the breast of the southern people toward this race, which would not only lead the present generation to slaughter them for political purposes, but which would induce the present men and women of the South, the present generation of southern people, to train up their own children as assassins. The arraignment to which the gentleman from Massachusetts subjected the distinguished characters he alluded to in his opening remarks was very well followed up by the arraignment of an entire section of his own country on a charge that they, by the policy and laws which they were adopting, were not only disposed themselves, inhumanly and brutally for party purposes, to murder the colored race, but were raising up their own children in these assassin-like ideas.

It is extremely difficult, Mr. Speaker, amid party excitement and party antagonism and party acrimony to impress the mind with the actual truth. It is extremely difficult to discuss the question which has been discussed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] with coolness, calmness, and deliberation, but yet with just enough of the real sentiment which seems to stir his heart in this matter, to impress us with the conviction that he labors under the idea that a whole section of this country, comprising twelve or thirteen States, can justly be denounced as assassins for political purposes. I say it is to induce the human mind to accept and acknowledge the actual truth. I believe, however, that it is the desire of the American people, or of the great body of the American people, without regard to party, to understand the question as it actually exists and arrive at the truth.

Now, sir, what is the truth? At the close of the war a large body of citizens who had been held in slavery, in reference to whom I had occasion to remark in an address which I made to the House some time since who were born slaves without any fault of their own as we were born masters without any fault of our own—this large body of men, with about eight hundred thousand voting population, were at once made electors and invested with the elective franchise. The question as to what was to be the policy to be adopted in reference to them, how they were to be instructed in the new duties placed upon them, was a very grave question. It was not only discussed in the State convention, in the convention of my own State as well as others, but it was discussed in the Senate of the United States, and the most important republican Senator to-day, [Mr. MORTON, of Indiana,] under a resolution adopted then, proceeded to my own State in 1867 to make an investigation. When the question arose as to what was the course to be pursued in regard to the recently enfranchised people and as to how soon they could be safely invested with the ballot, he took a position more extreme than any southern man; he took a position in consonance with the law of the gentleman's own State of Massachusetts in 1814, and repeated in the revision of her laws in 1836, that the colored persons who had been recently enfranchised by the results of the war ought to undergo a period of probation of from seven to ten years to qualify them to exercise the elective franchise intelligently, and when this was charged in the Senate Chamber by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON,] it was admitted by the gentleman from Indiana that he took that position too. I say, therefore, that it was not strange that a very grave question was presented to the convention which met in Mississippi in 1865. It adopted a constitution recognizing the freedom of the colored man. When the Legislature met, the first Legislature called after the adoption of that constitution, that Legislature was composed largely of what were known as Union men, the men who had constituted the old whig party of the State. I believe that that Legislature was composed without exception of men of that class, and that Legislature, to whose action the gentleman from Massachusetts has referred, elected to represent the State of Mississippi two gentlemen distinguished for their devotion to the Union, men who had subjected themselves to some odium during the war and had incurred some sacrifices; I allude to the late Chief Justice Sharkey and to the present republican Senator, [JAMES L. ALCORN.] These were men who were elected by that Legislature to represent the sovereignty of the State in the Senate of the United States, showing what was the character and complexion of the men who composed that Legislature. Now the statute of the State of Mississippi has been referred to which provides that a colored man should be required to have his residence by the 1st of January.

Sir, these people were all homeless and houseless; they were unprovided for; they had no means. They were made citizens; and I undertake to assert that no man from a northern State, from the State of Massachusetts, which was the first to manumit her slaves, down to New Jersey, which was the last to manumit her slaves, that no State enacted penal laws, and controlling laws, and limiting laws with regard to the rights of the new-made citizens as to rights of life and property less penal than did the State of Mississippi.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOOKER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Does the gentleman mean to say that there were no persons in Mississippi who desired to impose extreme penal laws upon the colored people?

Mr. HOOKER. I mean to say this, that so far as the Legislature was concerned the members of that Legislature were known as Union men, and I suppose a Union man in Mississippi is as good as a Union man in Massachusetts.

Now I believe, according to the revision of the laws of Massachusetts made in 1814, that State imposed more penal laws upon her colored citizens than Mississippi did, and I will refer to one section of her laws. I refer now to the statute of Massachusetts on page 306 of the revision of her code of 1814, and I will say that those were laws which were passed by the State of Massachusetts with regard to her colored people. Negroes were not allowed to be enrolled in her militia, but they were required to attend the militia meetings and to do such service as might be assigned to them.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to say that that act was passed in consequence of an act of Congress which inserted the word "white" in the militia law.

Mr. HOOKER. Because the act of Congress contained the word "white?"

Mr. HOAR. The act of Congress contained the word "white," and therefore the State could not constitutionally include negroes in the militia, though it would have done so very gladly. The negro sat in the Legislature of Massachusetts.

Mr. WILLIS. The act of Congress had nothing to do with the State militia.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, it had.

Mr. WILLIS. No; it was the national militia.

Mr. HOAR. There was no national militia.

Mr. HOOKER. The gentleman says that arose from the fact that in regulating the question of militia in Massachusetts they were controlled by an act of Congress. I supposed the gentleman would say that the act of Congress required that they should enroll the white militia, and therefore they had not the power to enroll the negroes in the militia. If they could not do that, then why did they require the negro to attend and perform menial services? If you did not intend to give them an equal position in the militia, why require their attendance for such purposes as that?

Further, by the same legislation negroes and mulattoes were prohibited from entertaining any negro or mulatto servant, were punishable under a penalty of five shillings for each offense; and if they were unable to pay the fine, they were to work at hard labor in the house of correction for two days for each shilling of the five.

Now what is the temper of that law and its spirit? Was it enacted in reference to the perfect freedom and perfect equality of the colored man? And further, the statute recited in its preamble that great change and inconvenience have occurred in divers towns by releasing and setting free negro and mulatto slaves, and it enacts that no such person shall be freed until bond and security shall be first given to indemnify the town against such negro or mulatto becoming a charge on the town. That was a law enacted in Indiana at a very late day.

Mr. HOAR. Does the gentleman say that that was a law of Massachusetts?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes; it is in your revised code of 1814.

Mr. YEATES. I am sorry the gentleman does not know his own State laws.

Mr. HOAR. I may perhaps be ignorant, but I never heard of a revised code of 1814 of the laws of Massachusetts.

Mr. HOOKER. Upon the same page, section 748, it is enacted that if any negro or mulatto shall strike any person of the English or other Christian nation, he shall be punished by a severe whipping, at the discretion of the justice.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from Mississippi will pardon me, but he is certainly under some grave mistake; there never was a revised code of Massachusetts in 1814.

Mr. HOOKER. It is so recited here.

Mr. HOAR. Then you have a wrong citation. The law which you have read, about setting negroes free upon condition of giving a bond, is absolutely repugnant to our constitution. The constitution of Massachusetts of 1780 provides that all men shall be free and equal. That clause was put in by John Lowell for the purpose of abolishing slavery in Massachusetts; and the next year, in a case in my own town of Worcester, the supreme court held that every slave was ipso facto emancipated by the constitution. And if the gentleman has any citation from any quarter of any law of Massachusetts of 1814 that a negro should be set free only on condition of giving bond, then all I can say is that if there ever was any such statute passed it was absolutely repugnant to our constitution, and never went into effect, and never could have gone into effect. I think the gentleman must have the wrong State.

Mr. HOOKER. I think not; and there is more of the same kind.

Mr. HOAR. My friend from the Essex district [Mr. THOMPSON] suggests that the gentleman must have some publication made in 1814 of old ante-revolutionary laws.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not know how far back the revision extends, but it shows what your law was at one time.

Mr. HOAR. If the gentleman means to say that there was in Massachusetts, before the constitution of that State abolished slavery, in old colonial times, some statute which required that slaves should not be set free without giving bond to save the town from charge, then he is very probably right; and there was a similar provision in regard to any white persons moving into a town; they could be warned out of the town by any freeholder, unless they could insure the town against liability of charge on their account.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me further.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman will excuse me; I am very sorry to interrupt him. But he would not certainly wish to appear as stating that Massachusetts passed in 1814 any such law as he has read.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not say so. I said that your revised code of 1814 stated that that was the law of Massachusetts, and I so state again.

Mr. HOAR. That may have been some ancient law of a hundred years ago.

Mr. HOOKER. That may be. But in the early days, when you had slaves in Massachusetts, before it was your interest to manumit them and you did manumit them, you showed a temper and spirit of hardship toward this race greater than the South ever did, though they were comparatively insignificant and few in number in Massachusetts, whereas with us they constitute a very large portion of the population. Hence it may be that the gentleman from Massachusetts will find a proper answer to the comment he has made of the fact that there are now sitting, and have been sitting in this House since the war, a number of intelligent colored men representing their own race and speaking upon this floor in their vindication and for their interest.

If it be true, sir, that there stirred in the blood of the gentleman or his ancestors that love of the freed race, why is it, if you made them free in 1780, that you never gave to the 14,000 freedmen that you had in Massachusetts a representative in the Halls of the national Legislature or allowed them to speak for their people? [Applause.] Why is it that that is not the case in one single northern State? It is because they were only one to one hundred in Massachusetts, and because in New Jersey, and all along down that range of States, they occupied the same relation, there being in New Jersey one colored man to about forty-six and one-half white people. I happened to be in New Jersey at one time, and saw some of these colored men. They were very intelligent, as intelligent as some of the colored gentlemen who now sit on this floor. If the colored man was beloved by the people of New Jersey and elsewhere in the North, why was it that they did not select some of these men to represent the interests of their race in the Halls of the national Legislature or of the State Legislatures? The manumission of the race in the South occurred as the necessary and legitimate result of the war; and I now state, upon my honor as a Representative on this floor, that I have yet to hear of one man, woman, or child within the limits of the State of Mississippi express the wish that their condition could be changed again. On the contrary, we accepted that result with the frankness and openness and sincerity with which we accepted every other legitimate result of the war. We had periled all save our honor in the contest, and we lost all; and when the war closed, when the terms of arbitrament were agreed to by the men who had crossed swords and bayonets on the battle-field, we were prepared to stand by those terms of arbitrament. But your politicians, who had shouldered no musket and drawn no sword, when they come into these Halls and the halls of our State Legislatures wanted to keep alive, as they do now, the animosities and the ranklings and the bitter spirit of the war. Why? They imagined, and naturally enough, that a simple-hearted, innocent, guileless race, taking them in the main and in the bulk, and uninfluenced and untaught by the midnight teacher who came there in the shape of the "carpet-bagger" after the war—they knew that this simple class of people might naturally be appealed to to support those who had freed them, those who, in the language of the republican speakers, had "struck from their ankles and their wrists the chains of servitude." Therefore the republican party thought that they would be able to control the vote of the Southern States because they would be able to control the vote of the colored man; and I regret to say that for six long years, from 1869 to 1875, they did use this simple-hearted race, who were, in the main, the tillers of our land; they did bind them together for political purposes. They thought they would hold them there forever; that they would be able to utilize them for party purposes by controlling their votes.

Sir, I tell you that now those people are beginning to understand that the intimate material relations existing between the white man of the South and the colored man of the South, the unity of interest, the identity of material prosperity or adversity, make their union socially, and to a large extent politically, a necessity.

They have, I say, been used by this party; and only last winter, when your "force bill" was under discussion, when, after you had given to the South by your legislation ten years of misrule, little less onerous than the four years of war, you introduced your "force bill" for the purpose of putting those States back under military power, the organ of the Administration in this city, the organ of the republican party here to-day, said while that bill was pending that it was necessary the measure should pass—for what? To secure peace to that distressed land? To pour oil upon the troubled waters? O, no; it was necessary that you should still "shake the bloody shirt" with the fond hope that you would be able to divide the southern white man and the southern black man. That was the purpose. That organ went further and remarked that it must be remembered that since these 800,000 colored men had been invested with the ballot, since the ratio of representation had been thus increased in this House and the power of the South thus enlarged in the electoral college, it only required fifty electoral votes besides those of the South to elect the President; and hence the South must be put under military rule, in order that those electoral votes might be made republican.

My attention is called by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to the following:

ROOMS OF THE STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE,
Indianapolis, September 3, 1874.

DEAR SIR: I desire to call your attention to the horrible scenes of violence and bloodshed transpiring through the South, and suggest that you give them as great prominence as possible in your paper from this time until after the election.

THOMAS J. BRADY, Chairman.

EDITOR OF UNION, Rensellaer, Indiana.

Mr. McMAHON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether that Thomas J. Brady is not now the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, recently appointed?

Mr. HOOKER. I believe he is the same person.

I wish to recur for a moment to the laws passed in various northern States upon the relations of the races. In the revision of the statutes of Rhode Island of 1822, page 371, (Rhode Island being one of the States that manumitted their slaves,) intermarriage between whites and blacks was prohibited, and such marriages were declared void. This provision was continued in the revision of 1857, page 312, and also in the revision of 1872, page 325, seven years after the war had closed; and any person joining such persons in marriage was liable to a fine of $200. Whites only were allowed to vote, as will be found by reference to the revision of 1822, page 89.

Granting license for keeping taverns, ale-houses, victualing-houses, cook-shops, oyster-shops, and for retailing liquors, were prohibited to "any colored or black persons; nor shall any white person duly licensed suffer any black or colored person in his employ, or his agent, to sell any liquor whatever, under the penalty of forfeiting such license." (Revision of 1822, page 295.)

There was the freedom which another northern State gave to the colored man! There was the freedom of action allowed to him there. That is the temper and spirit in which this law was passed.

Mr. HOAR. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi for his information that there was a similar law in reference to intermarriage to that which he has referred to in Massachusetts down to 1832.

Mr. HOOKER. I knew there was, and only refrained from reading it seeing how much distressed it made the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] I did not quote any more on his account; I went to another State, thinking that he would be less sensitive. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. We deprived them of the right of intermarriage and the right to sell liquor. We admit it frankly. Does the gentleman think that is equivalent to selling them into slavery?

Mr. HOOKER. I come now to the State of Connecticut. Slavery was abolished in 1784 by declaring free all born of slave mothers after that time; but these children were bound to serve their owners until the age of twenty-five years. Those born before were continued in slavery. (See Jackson vs. Bullock, 2 Connecticut Reports, page 38.)

Here you observe what is the temper and what is the disposition of these States on this subject.

Citizens of United States only voters, excluding blacks, as they were not citizens. (Constitution of Maine of 1819, article 2.)

We come next to Pennsylvania. Slavery was abolished in this State in 1780. (Dunlap Revision, page 126.)

The act, after an eloquent recital of the wrongs of slaves and the evils of slavery, and a reference to the happy condition of the whites in escaping the slavery to which they had been doomed by the British, and declaring the whites by long experience had been weaned from prejudices, and that their hearts were now filled with benevolence and kindness toward all men, and that in justice to the unhappy slaves they now proceeded to act, then merely set free those who shall be born within the State after the passage of the act, retaining all others in slavery, with a proviso, however, that all so born and set free should be servants and bound to their owners till they were twenty-eight years of age.

That was the temper in Pennsylvania years ago. They were not allowed, according to Purdon's Digest, page 1269; Brightly's Purdon's Digest, page 829, to serve on the jury. Whites only were allowed to vote until 1870. Negroes and mulattoes were excluded from militia duty until 1870.

In New Jersey, which I have already remarked was the last State to manumit, an act passed February, 1820, for the gradual abolition of slavery made free every child born of a slave since July 4, 1804, but provided that such child should remain the servant of the owner of his or her mother as if bound to service by the overseers of the poor until the male children were twenty-eight and the female twenty-one years of age. (Revision of 1847, page 360.)

On the 18th of April, 1846, (same revision, page 380,) an act was passed to abolish slavery finally, and every slave then in the State was made free; but every such freedman was made an apprentice to his then owner, who was only allowed to discharge him from service by procuring the certificate of the overseer of the poor and of two justices that such apprentice proposed to be freed was of sound mind and capable of making a support, or without such certificate if the owner would give bond with security that the negro would not become a charge on the county.

The children of these apprentices were to be supported by their masters till they were six years old; and then, in all cases, were to be bound as poor children by the overseers of the poor, the owner having the preference. Persons enticing away such apprentices were declared guilty of a misdemeanor, and fined $100; and persons harboring such apprentices were made liable to pay $1 for each day they so harbored them. Only whites were allowed to be enrolled in the militia, (ibid., 745,) and only whites were entitled to vote. (See constitution of 1847, article 2.) Its constitution, as far as I have been able to learn, has not been changed.

It is rather a mild provision in the laws of Mississippi on the subject of vagrancy when you put it side by side with the laws of New Jersey. It is so in Ohio, and in Indiana, and in various other States of the Union.

Mr. CASON. I desire to state that in Indiana the laws you refer to were passed when the democrats were in the majority. And since the war all efforts to repeal those laws have been resisted almost unanimously by the democratic party. The democratic party has almost unanimously voted against repeal, while the republican party has insisted upon their repeal. The laws were passed when the democratic party had control of Indiana.

Mr. HOOKER. Let us see what they provided by law in Indiana.

Mr. CASON. Yes, sir; you can prove anything. You can prove they enacted the most infamous laws; but it was done by the democratic party.

Mr. HOOKER. That is enough. In Indiana by statutes (see revision of 1831, page 375) free negroes were prohibited from settling in the State unless bond and security for $100 in each case was given that he should not become a charge on the county as a pauper, and it was provided that if the negro was convicted of any penal offense (however trivial, as an affray or gaming) the whole bond was forfeited. A negro settling in the State, and failing to give the bond, was to be hired out by a public officer for six months unless he removed from the State, and any person hiring or harboring such a negro was liable to be fined $1,000.

A negro or mulatto having one-fourth negro blood could not be a witness for or against a white person. (Ibid., page 404.)

By the first constitution, adopted in 1816, only whites were allowed to vote, (article 6, section 1,) and only whites could be in the militia. (Article 7, section 11.) Marriages between whites and blacks were prohibited, and if such persons should go out of the State to marry, the marriage was void in Indiana. Whites and blacks or mulattoes intermarrying were liable to imprisonment in the penitentiary from one to ten years, and all persons aiding in or advising such marriage were punishable in the same way; and any person concealing or harboring whites and negroes who had intermarried, with intent to prevent their detection and punishment, were punishable in the penitentiary from one to five years. (Ibid., pages 595 and 970.)

No want of religious belief in whites was a ground to exclude them as witnesses, but blacks and mulattoes were excluded in cases for or against whites. (Revision of 1843, page 719.) This provision was in force at least as late as 1862. (Gavin & Hord's Statutes, volume 2, page 166.)

The constitution of Indiana, made in 1851 and still remaining as then written, at least as late as 1870, prohibits negroes and mulattoes from voting; article 5, section 5, and article 13 of that constitution prohibits negroes and mulattoes from moving to and settling in the State; and that constitution makes void any contract made with negroes and mulattoes so coming into the State; and all persons employing them or encouraging them to settle in the State were liable to be fined from $50 to $500.

In the Revision of 1852, page 361, the same provision heretofore set out as to intermarriage between whites and blacks was continued.

By statute, negroes coming into the State to settle in violation of the constitution were liable to be fined from $10 to $500. (Revision of 1852, page 376.) And by that constitution negroes and mulattoes were excluded from the militia. (Article 12, section 1.) This provision is still in force. (Davis's Supplement of 1870, page 341.)

In 1860 negroes and mulattoes were not liable to school taxes nor entitled to the benefit of school funds in Indiana. (Gavin & Hord's Revision, volume 1, page 542.) This provision re-enacted on 6th of March, 1865. (Davis's Supplement, page 440.)

Very stringent laws were passed to carry out that provision of the constitution which prohibited negroes from settling in the State, and these were not repealed until 22d February, 1867, but the constitution itself remained unchanged in 1870, and is probably so at this time.

Now the gentleman says that this was done by democrats. If it be so, Mr. Speaker, it is only a forcible illustration of what I had occasion to say to the House not long since, that the relation between the races is one which is not political and ought never to be made so, but is social in its character, and has only been political since the war, simply by the effort to convert them to the uses and purposes as voters at the ballot-box for the one party as against the other. That has been the policy of the legislation that has been adopted.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman inform the House——

Mr. HOOPER. I am asked to yield for a moment to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS.]

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. In reply to my colleague from Indiana, I wish to say that the thirteenth article of the constitution of Indiana was submitted to the people of that State as a separate proposition. It was an article that prohibited negroes or mulattoes from coming into the State. I want to say that that article was adopted by 95,000 majority in the State; republicans and democrats all voting for it.

Mr. ROBINSON. There was no republican party in Indiana at that time.

Mr. YEATES. Did not Mr. MORTON vote for it?

Mr. HOAR. What I desire to ask the gentleman from Mississippi is this, if he will allow me to ask him a single question.

Mr. HOOKER. Do not make it a long one, please.

Mr. HOAR. What was the mode in which these people attempted to use the negroes? Was it not in the way of asking their votes and using arguments with them?

Mr. HOOKER. I will inform you on that subject as I proceed. I will remark in reply to what has fallen from the gentleman from Indiana that I think the distinguished Senator who now represents in part the State of Indiana in the other branch of Congress [Mr. MORTON] was a member of the Legislature which passed these laws.

Mr. LUTTRELL. And a democrat.

Mr. HOOKER. And he ought to be good authority on that subject. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asks me a question. He asks how his party attempted to use the negroes. They attempted to use them by sending emissaries among them who acted like the man who, instead of coming boldly to your front door and asking to be permitted to make your acquaintance, steals in through your back gate during the night. And midnight hours when the white people were asleep these emissaries held meetings with the colored race and told them that an inevitable hostility existed between them and the whites of the southern country, just as they are told now; insisted that that hostility was irreconcilable, that it could not be reconciled, and that if they would retain their freedom they must go to the polls and vote in solid phalanx for the republican party.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to ask the gentleman if they could have met the colored people in any other way except by stealth?

Mr. HOOKER. I will give you the whole history if you will only keep quiet.

Mr. HOAR. Did they not state the outrages which were being committed as the reason for holding the meetings in the way they did?

Mr. HOOKER. I do not know. I did not hear many of them. Those meetings were held at midnight, when I was asleep.

Mr. HOAR. From all you knew about it was not that the fact?

Mr. HOOKER. Let me refer now to Arkansas, one of the States which have been recently reconstructed under democratic rule, and where you have not heard of a single disturbance there since it has been reconstructed, as in Virginia, Mississippi, and Alabama, where these people evince their desire for good government, and appreciate the necessity of a union with the old white people of the country, as not only the only safety, politically, but the only safety socially, the only safety from the wolf which is at the door of all the people, white and colored, in our country. In Alabama they recently rolled up a majority of thirty-odd thousand in favor of the democratic party; and I tell you they will do it in every State of the Union. [Applause.] I do not despair of seeing it everywhere, when they are left to determine freely for themselves without the bands and shackles of party ties, which party they will vote with.

Now, in Arkansas, I am informed by my friend Judge WILSHIRE that three hundred and seven commissioned offices are held by colored men under the democratic administration. Did you ever have that many in Massachusetts, or the tenth part of that number? Did you ever have it in any State which has a mixed population? I tell you, Mr. Speaker, and I say to this House, and I say it from my own profound conviction of the truthfulness of what I say, that amidst all the shaking of the bloody shirts, amidst all the desire of politicians to divide us, there is no friend of the colored man more sincere and more honest than he who was master in the time when the relations prevailed of master and slave.

Mr. SMALLS. That is not so.

Mr. HOOKER. You think not?

Mr. SMALLS again rose.

Mr. HOOKER. Well, that is your opinion. Take your seat now, I do not want to be interrupted any further. I do not expect that any white politician or any colored politician is likely to admit any such thing.

Mr. SMALLS. The colored people never voted the democratic ticket except under intimidation.

Mr. HOOKER. They have voted it in my State, and they are forming democratic associations there now in the very county where the capital is situated, the county of Hinds, where Governor Ames presided in the executive office, where the marshals of the United States were with their forces; where the Army of the United States was stationed. In that county of Hinds William A. Montgomery testified before the committee sent to my State that they not only formed such associations by dozens, but by whole companies. And I myself saw at Edwards' Depot, in the lower portion of that county, in 1875, as many as two hundred and fifty to three hundred colored men riding in the ranks of the democratic party and bearing the banners of the democratic party.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will my colleague allow me to make one statement?

Mr. HOOKER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SINGLETON. In confirmation of what my colleague states, I desire to say that I attended a barbecue at Yazoo City after the election was over; and I state it on my veracity—doubt it who will—that I saw hundreds and thousands of colored men in line with their banners and music, celebrating the democratic victory. My colleague, Mr. LAMAR, was present and made a speech. I made a short speech myself. And that is in the county from which I received a dispatch this morning inviting me to a grand barbacue, gotten up in part or in whole by colored people.

Mr. SMALLS. If they were not hunted down by Ku-Klux and made to go into the democratic ranks they never would go into them.

Mr. HOOKER. That is not so; that is all done away with. Everybody knows that in that country there was no such thing.

I asserted the other day, and it cannot be denied, that in the whole State south of Pearl River there was not one single effort at intimidation anywhere. In many of the counties lying south of that river they had organized the colored people into clubs; that I know was the case in Rankin County, and it was also in the county where the capital is situated. There existed under the capital of the State, right under the walls of the capitol, where the governor was and the offices of the government; it is a very remarkable fact that under the law supervisors were appointed to conduct the election in every district, and not one of these supervisors reported any irregularities in the election of 1875.

Sir, we of Mississippi are spending thousands of dollars, as I said to a gentleman with whom I was speaking yesterday, every year in going to Alabama and to Georgia to bring colored men to cultivate our lands. We bring them there for the purpose of using them as cultivators of our soil, and we find no difficulty in inducing them to leave the overflowed land, the sterile land in those States to come to the more fertile lands of the valley. Do you believe that men will expend their money to import them there, even if there were no sentiment of humanity or the common feeling of one man to another whatever may be the color of his skin, would as a question of interest take a shot-gun and go out and shoot men down? Sir, it is not true, as I said the other day; it is a slander on both races. The great bulk of both races live together harmoniously. Here and there there is a bad white man and here and there there is a bad colored man, and so far as disturbances have occurred in Mississippi I assert without fear of contradiction that the first disturbance which ever occurred between the white and colored race was under the administration of Governor Ames, who recently fled the State while articles of impeachment were pending against him before the Legislature. At the time of the first disturbance in the county of Warren, in which my own little farm chances to lie, a proclamation was issued by Crosby, the colored sheriff of the county, calling upon the negroes to band together and march upon Vicksburgh and insist upon his institution in office.

The republican State attorney, General Harris, in a letter recently published in the New York Herald, stated that in a conversation which occurred between himself and Governor Ames and other republicans when Ames advised Crosby to insist upon his rights, it was asked, "Are you not afraid this will lead to bloodshed?" That question was asked by Harris, the attorney-general of the State then and now, and Ames's reply was, "The blood of twenty-five or thirty colored men would be of service to the republican party now." Up to the 7th of December, 1874, there never had been anything like a serious conflict of races in the State of Mississippi, but when that proclamation was issued by the colored sheriff of Warren County three armed bands of colored men marched on three separate roads toward the city of Vicksburgh. They were met on the confines of the city. The gentleman who headed the white people sent a messenger to treat with them, but they declined any offers and a conflict ensued in which several colored men were killed.

Sir, were the white people of Vicksburgh to lie supinely down and allow their lives and property to be destroyed and their wives and children to be slaughtered? Ah, sir, they would have been something more or less than men if they had not taken up arms in defense of their households and of their city. They did it, and I say that was the first outrage or difficulty between the two races that occurred in the State of Mississippi, and it was precipitated by the bad advice of the republican governor, General Ames, and by the inconsiderate action of Sheriff Crosby, of Warren County.

I say, sir, in no instance has there been a case of conflict between the two races by the deliberate desire of the white race. On the contrary, in every act and declaration of the democratic party from 1869 to the present time, we have always said to the colored population: "You have been made voters by the Constitution of the United States and are free to cast your votes for us or against us." That is the only appeal that has ever been made to the colored race upon that subject.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes, if you make it short.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman deny that there were seven regularly organized and armed companies of white men in Vicksburgh for a month before this outrage on the city, who paraded the streets during the election in August and kept up their organization, taking the very arms furnished to the negroes themselves?

Mr. HOOKER. Sit down and I will inform you.

Mr. CONGER. I shall not sit down; I do not like that dictatorial way of addressing me.

Mr. HOOKER. I am entitled to the floor, and have been interrupted enough. I decline to yield further. I answer the gentleman's inquiry by saying that there never was any disposition on the part of the white people of Vicksburgh to arm themselves or organize, until a colored company, furnished by the State with arms and commanded by a man by the name of Hall, paraded the streets, occupying both the roadway and the sidewalk, so that the ladies of Vicksburgh walked the streets with difficulty. When that was done there was an organization of a company commanded by Colonel Miller, a leading member of the bar of Vicksburgh, one of the kindest, justest, and most upright men that I know in the State of Mississippi. Whatever he did on the occasion which has been referred to was done in defense of the city.

Did the white people go to the peaceable plantations where they were to seek this controversy? It so happened that my own place was in that county, and when this disturbance occurred I went to it. Two colored men had passed through it, dressed in semi-uniform, and they proposed to the colored people on my place that they should unite in this march on Vicksburgh. Their answer was: Our rights have not been invaded; no injustice has been done us; we have not been attacked and outraged by white men; the owner of this place does not propose to do it, and we do not suppose he intends to let anybody else do it.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman allow me one other question?

Mr. HOOKER. Not now. Now, in regard to this organization, there are numbers of the ablest men in the city of Vicksburgh who are willing to attest under oath that there never was an attempt at an organization there until this attempt was made to arm the colored people against the white people. I believe that is the feeling everywhere throughout the State. It would be as absurd for us to say that we wanted to slaughter this race, that we wanted to oppress them, as it would be for the manufacturers who have built up the brick walls of Lowell to turn upon their operatives and endeavor to oppress and slaughter them.

Now I venture to assert that if we had sent emissaries from the Southern States to the city of Lowell, and had asked her industrious and hard-working operatives to meet us in one of their halls, and had endeavored to inculcate the lesson that capital was grinding down labor and that they were not sufficiently compensated for their labor—if southern men had done that in the town of Lowell they would have been found the next morning ornamenting the handsome lamp-posts of that city, and nobody would have doubted that they deserved it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOOKER. My time is almost out, and I cannot yield further; but for that I would yield. It would be no more unnatural for northern capital to turn against the men who by their bone and sinew make their capital valuable to them than it would be for the southern men to turn against their laboring population. All over the State of Mississippi there is this intimate relation existing between the colored and the white people. They are all united together in attempting to make a common living by the culture of the soil mainly; for 80 per cent. of our population, composed in large part of these colored people, are engaged in farming operations.

It is cruel, it is inhuman, it is an outrage in any party for party purposes and objects to endeavor to stir up bad blood between the old white master of the South and the old slave of the South. If you leave them alone, as they have been left in Virginia, in Arkansas, in Alabama, and in Georgia, the relations between the two races will adjust themselves upon a fair and just foundation, upon the principle of full and equal protection under the law, the full and equal right of suffrage, which is accorded to the colored men. And the colored man like the white man, as he becomes instructed and informed, will vote with the one party or the other as his judgment may determine.

That is all we have ever asked, that they shall be allowed to the limited extent that many of them are educated and are able to reason to speak and to act for themselves. Why is it that you northern men want to raise a wall of division between the two races that occupy the South? Do you want to press your own white Caucasian race to the earth, to grind them down into the soil? Do you want to oppress them, and to use the colored race as the engine of oppression? If not, then why is it that whenever, as now, light begins to dawn upon the horizon of the vexed civil and unfortunate political question—why is it that when left to their own judgment free to act for themselves and the dawn of the era of reconciliation has begun, you rise in your places in the Congress of the United States and declare that there is hostility on the part of the white race toward the black race?

What do you want to do? Do you want to help the colored man? He stands under the Constitution and the laws upon a perfectly level plane with the white man. Do you want to oppress the white man? I say that the party, be it what it may, that undertakes to subject one race, whether white or black, to the oppression of the other for party purposes is guilty of an inhumanity fouler and more worthy of being stigmatized than any act that can justly be charged upon any southern community.

I believe that if you will leave these two races to themselves, to govern their own portion of the country in their own way, there will be perfect peace and quiet. Members of each race are voters; members of each race are jurors; each race has the right to testify in cases where any person, white or black, is affected. I have sat in my own court-house and seen cases tried where there were ten black men on the jury and only two whites, and white men were the only parties in the controversy.

I went to the neighboring State of Louisiana, to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has alluded as copying the obnoxious laws of Mississippi; I went to that State to defend a young white man who had been charged with shooting a colored man. He was tried before twelve black jurors, not a white man on the jury. The district attorney who tried the case, when appealed to, had not the magnanimity to withdraw his challenge against the only two white men who appeared and were not debarred from sitting on the jury trying the case.

To show the present feeling in the North on the subject of electing colored men to office, I will read the following from the New York Herald of August 8, 1876:

One of the phrases oftenest used about the Southern States is that they "must become like the North." "We want to make Louisiana like the North," said a very prominent republican of that State the other day. "We want to make Mississippi like the Norf," said a colored sheriff of that State not long ago to a northern traveler, who replied to him gravely, "You are sheriff of this county, my friend; you cannot write a sentence correctly; you can barely read; you own less than five hundred dollars' worth of property in the world; yet you are sheriff of a great county, and you want to have your State like the North. Believe me when I tell you that there is not a State nor county in all the North where ten men could be found to nominate you for sheriff, or, in fact, for any office whatever. I do not speak it to offend you, but to inform you. If you lived anywhere in the North, even in Massachusetts or the western reserve of Ohio, no soul would ever for a moment think of nominating you even for constable, much less sheriff. You would be a patient and contented day laborer or farmer, and your wildest dreams would not lead you to think of office." Is not this true? And if so, when we echo the southern republican's or the southern negro's cry that the South shall be "like the North," ought we not to think what that means? Louisiana has a negro lieutenant-governor; Mississippi had one until he was impeached for bribery. Almost every southern State has colored State officers, colored sheriffs, colored tax-collectors, colored judges, colored school officers. In this are they not unlike, very unlike, "the North?" Frederick Douglass is a cultivated man, an eloquent speaker, a forcible writer, a man of property, a good citizen. What party in New York has ever thought of nominating him for lieutenant-governor?

These are the sentiments of a fair-minded and impartial journal, and I submit it is a complete and perfect vindication of the views which I have expressed to the House, and which I feel all men outside of the poor and simple politician, who, looking beyond the peace and prosperity of the common country, regards alone that which promises success to the republican party.

During the delivery of Mr. HOOKER's remarks, at the expiration of one hour,

Mr. RANDALL obtained the floor.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] may be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. RANDALL. I would be very glad to allow the gentleman from Mississippi to go on——

Mr. HOOKER. I do not desire it.

Mr. RANDALL. If the public business were not of so imperative a character.

Mr. HOOKER. I wish to make a single request, with the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] There are some matters which I have not been able to read and which I would like permission to print.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I object.

Mr. CONGER. I hope there will be no objection from gentlemen on this side of the House to allowing the gentleman from Mississippi to go on.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. I am making a request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded, and the gentleman cannot make a request.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there further objection to allowing the gentleman from Mississippi to print additional remarks? The Chair hears none.

Mr. RANDALL. I now desire to submit a conference report.

Mr. LYNCH. I would like to make a request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must insist that it is not in order except by unanimous consent. [Cries of "Objection!" and "Regular order!"]

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I present the report which I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
W. R. MORRISON,
Managers on the part of the House.

WM. WINDOM,
T. F. BAYARD,
W. B. ALLISON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that a communication from the Senate relating to this subject be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
August 9, 1876.

Resolved, That the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and ask a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BAYARD be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, after many and protracted conferences and after contests, paragraph by paragraph, between the two Houses in the conference committee last appointed, we were enabled to reach a conclusion as to all matters except two. One related to the proposed reduction in the salary of members of Congress and the other to the restoration of the salary of the President of the United States to $25,000 a year. The House conferees were unwilling to yield either of these points. The Senate conferees with unanimity declared that they would not yield on either subject their position, which was to continue the salary of members of Congress as now fixed by law and to continue the salary of the President of the United States for the next term as now fixed by law for the present incumbent, whose salary Congress has not the constitutional power to change.

The line of policy adopted by the House in the passage of this bill was to reduce the salaries of the various executive officers of the Government in moderate degree. Of course we could not make that reduction with propriety unless at the same time we reduced our own salary in equal proportion. This was the position of the three conferees representing the House.

It is due to the Senate to state the manner in which they presented the case. As to the salaries of members of Congress, they argued that since the salary was fixed at $5,000 the franking privilege had been abolished, which in a measure reduces the salary by compelling members to pay their own postage and the expense of sending out the books which they may distribute among their constituents.

As to the salary of the President of the United States, it was fixed at the present amount by a provision inserted in an appropriation bill. The people of the United States condemned that law; and the Congress succeeding that which enacted it, repealed it so far as they could. They could not under the Constitution change the salary of the President during the term of the present incumbent. This House, however at the present session, has undertaken to repeal the increase as to the future, rescinding to that extent the provision of the former appropriation act which increased the presidential salary from $25,000 to $50,000. On this subject the position of the Senate conferees was substantially this: that both Houses of Congress had the right to repeal in a separate bill the increased salary of the President so far as it extends beyond the present term, and had exercised that right in passing through both branches of Congress a bill which had been sent to the President, and vetoed by him upon grounds stated in his message. I may mention by the way that the veto message is now in the Senate, where it has remained, unacted upon, for a long time. The Senate claims that to insert this measure in an appropriation bill would be a species of coercion upon the President of the United States. I maintain that, the salary having been increased in a bill of this character, it is entirely competent and just for Congress in the same manner and through the same agencies to repeal that increase; for I believe that this part of the act was as fully condemned as the provision increasing the salary of members.

We found ourselves in the situation that neither side would yield. The Senate conferees offered, in so far as the salary of the President of the United States was concerned, we should appropriate the money up to the 4th of March next at $50,000 a year, and leave it for the next session of this Congress to change the law if possible, and make the appropriation in time for the salary of the President of the United States next coming in from and after the 4th of March next.

I think I have now given a true history of the situation. The conferees on the part of the House were unwilling, few in number as they were, to assume such a grave responsibility as to yield, but were not unwilling, however, to offer to the House the points of difference and take their instruction, and we so finally agreed in our conference. In obedience thereto we now make such submission. If the action of the two Houses were concurrent then we could proceed.

Mr. LORD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania let me ask him a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. LORD. Has the gentleman any expectation there will be any agreement if a further conference is appointed; or does he regard the action of the Senate conferees as final as to their decision?

Mr. RANDALL. I was going on to say that I am informed by the paper just read at the desk, and I am otherwise informed in a reliable manner, that the Senate in their determination in these respects is fixed, and, I might say, unalterably so. The responsibility of failure in these respects, therefore, to my mind, and I think to every dispassionate mind, is with the Senate and the Senate only. They say they are willing to take that responsibilty.

Mr. HOUSE. The question of the gentleman from New York is whether a new conference committee might not agree. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say the Senate is settled in its conviction.

Mr. RANDALL. Having sent the same conference committee over here, it is the parliamentary manner of expressing intention between the Houses, from one House to the other. Having sustained their conferees in their attitude, it is as much as to say, just in the language as I have stated, what their object is.

Mr. LORD. Let me ask the gentleman another question. Does he not understand that the Senate by vote has instructed its conferees not to recede on this question?

Mr. RANDALL. That is not in that communication from the Senate, but I believe that is the fact. It was stated, I am informed, by my colleague on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. LORD. I have so understood and desired to know whether the conferees on the part of the House so understand it.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly. While the conferees on the part of the House were unwilling to assume the responsibility of this position and yield to what the Senate conferees demanded, of course they were entirely willing to report the subject back to the House, and let the House assume that responsibility which belongs to it more properly than to them.

Mr. LORD. Let me ask another question. Has not the Senate appointed the same conferees?

Mr. RANDALL. It has.

Mr. LORD. Is that not in parliamentary proceeding notice from the Senate to this House they will not recede?

Mr. RANDALL. It is. I now yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, this subject of reduction of salaries and expenditures has been under consideration for eight months. This bill passed the House four months ago and this conference was appointed one month ago, after ineffectual efforts in previous conferences to settle the question.

It seems to me, sir, we have pressed our views to the very extremity of right as well as of duty. I know of no way to compel the Senate to concur in our opinions on this subject, and I do not think in any more emphatic way we could have insisted on our purpose than we have done.

As the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated, we have substantially agreed on all other items embraced in this bill than those relating to pay of members and of the President. In this agreement, Mr. Speaker, we have yielded many things which I believe we ought not to have been compelled to yield; but we have succeeded in obtaining some things which are desirable. The items upon which we agree result in the discharge of seven hundred and sixty-five men, employés now in the pay of the Government. This reduction of force, together with reduction of expenditures and salaries which we secure, results in an annual saving by this bill of one and a half million dollars.

A MEMBER. Employés, not men.

Mr. MORRISON. I think those to be discharged are all men. I believe there is no provision for the discharge of women, but there may be.

The result, Mr. Speaker, of the bill, so far as agreed upon, will be an annual saving of a million and a half of dollars below that insisted upon by the Senate. This, at least, is something.

Now, what is the condition of things if we persist in our former course and refuse to yield on these two points? We continue from time to time for ten days or for a month the existing condition of things; that is, we continue appropriations at the rates provided for the preceding fiscal year for ten days at a time indefinitely.

In the mean time the expenditures go along on the present scale at present rates, and this saving that we obtain by a settlement, such as we can obtain, of a million and a half, will thereby be lost.

Mr. GARFIELD. A hundred thousand dollars a month.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not care to count whether it is a hundred thousand dollars a month or a hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars a month. It is worth saving. And I presume no one insists that if we cannot have our way about this thing we will refuse all appropriations, and thereby deprive the Government of the necessary means for continued operations. Nobody here entertains any such proposition as that. Unless we are willing to assume the responsibility of doing that, we must yield these points of difference or continue the present scale of expenditure from time to time, indefinitely.

That is the result, the inevitable result of refusing the demands of the Senate upon these two questions. I am not answered by saying it is not right that we should be required to appropriate more money than ought to be appropriated for pay of members and pay of the President. We must concede the equal right of the Senate with the House to determine how much money ought to be appropriated. This is matter of opinion. And it is a matter, as I have said, on which we cannot compel the Senate to yield entirely to us. I know of no way of coercing the Senate or the President unless we are prepared to say we will appropriate nothing if we do not have our own way about it.

Now, sir, in this condition of things it seems to me we ought to act rationally and yield what we cannot save. We have taken our position and insisted for long months upon this reduction of expenditure. We have no constitutional or rightful means of coercing the Senate or the President, who are not in accord with us and who have stoutly resisted us from the beginning as to the reduction both of our own and the presidential compensation as well as other reductions which they now yield. They refuse to yield further. In this continued refusal such of my political friends as desire to do so may make all the political capital there is in this question.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SINGLETON. Did the Senate incline to recede to any extent from the $50,000, or do they insist upon that being the amount? Is there no chance for a compromise upon that?

Mr. MORRISON. The Senate conferees insisted on appropriating the salary of the present occupant of the presidential chair, which is virtually an abandonment of this question and a continuation of the present salary, though this salary may be reduced at any time between now and the 4th of March next, whatever we may do here to-day.

Mr. WILLIS. Is it not in the power of Congress under any circumstances to reduce the salary of the President before the 4th of next March? I ask, therefore, if anything would be gained by this bill if it passed? I want the House and the country to understand that nothing could be gained.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is mistaken in supposing the next Congress can change the salary of the next President.

Mr. WILLIS. As I understand the Constitution, we can do so next session.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] can bring up this question at the next session of Congress. He will not be precluded from reducing the President's salary or his own at the next session, if the House and Senate will then agree.

Mr. WILLIS. I simply wish the country to understand that we can pass this bill next session as well as now. I have no further interest in it, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MORRISON. The country will understand this matter as well as we do. I was proceeding to say that in refusing to yield these two points we cannot secure the large annual saving of expenditure involved in the other portions of the bill, including the discharge of these seven hundred and sixty-five employés. If we are desirous of accomplishing something and willing to accomplish something, although we cannot obtain all we desire, there is no other way to do it but to abandon these two propositions, because the Senate has heretofore determined repeatedly and has again to-day finally determined by a vote in open Senate not to yield to a reduction either in the salary of Members and Senators or of the President.

Mr. LORD rose.

Mr. KASSON. As one of the conference committee, I desire to say but a single word before the gentleman from New York takes the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa as a member of the conference committee.

Mr. KASSON. It was with difficulty, Mr. Speaker, that I could hear my colleague from Illinois on the committee, [Mr. MORRISON;] but I think he stated that large and important reductions had been accomplished by the consultations of the conference committee, and especially in the direction which I think this House, on both sides of it, greatly desired, namely, in respect to those salaries which had been increased since 1860, during the time of inflation, when employés of the Government could not live on the salaries previously given. The reductions in those salaries we have succeeded with the approval of the Senate conferees in making permanent, which I regard as a very great gain in that direction.

The reductions are also made permanent, which is a great gain in that direction. On the two remaining points I should say that there were two alternatives presented; one was to take the presidential salary from the 4th of March entirely out of the bill, leaving Congress at its next session to dispose of that as it chose to do, and the other was to appropriate the money called for by the Constitution until the 4th of March. The conferees on the part of the Senate claimed that the House having acted on a separate bill in a constitutional manner, and sent it to the Senate, and that bill having been vetoed by the President, the only constitutional mode of dealing with the question was to act on the question of the veto, and not to add it to an appropriation bill where a majority vote alone would be required to act upon it.

On the question of congressional salaries there were two alternatives; one was to leave our salaries out of the appropriation bill, eliminating all questions of personal interest from the approval or disapproval of the bill, leaving the appropriation to go over to the next session. I need not say that it was the opinion of us all that it would be convenient to make that disposition of the question, and therefore we were brought to the question of the necessity of asking the advice of the House in some way whether under these circumstances, as the conferences upon this bill have been extremely laborious, as to the propriety of yielding on these two points or spend a week or two more in endeavoring to arrive at a conclusion which must be eventually the same.

Mr. LORD. Understanding from the fact that the Senate has appointed the same conferees that that is notice to this House in the most emphatic legislative form that the Senate will not recede on these two questions, and believing that the conferees on the part of the House have done all that could be reasonably expected that they could do in the premises, I offer the resolution which I ask the Clerk to read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Senate has refused to yield to existing differences between the two Houses on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which differences relate to the salaries of members of Congress and of the President; and whereas we are apprised that any further conference on the subject will be useless and can make no change in the determination of the Senate: Therefore,

Resolved, That the conferees on the part of the House be, and they are hereby, instructed to recede from such points of disagreement.

Mr. LORD. Upon that resolution I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was put on agreeing to the resolution; and on a division, there were—ayes 109, noes 56.

Mr. CUTLER and Mr. LUTTRELL called for the yeas and nays.

The question was put on ordering the yeas and nays, and 23 members voted in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair holds that a sufficient number have not voted to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered—only 22 members voting therefor.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. In reference to the report of the committee of conference I do not understand what became of it.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the House consent to the request of the Senate for a further conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. RANDALL, Mr. MORRISON, and Mr. KASSON.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to reconsider the vote by which the message of the President in relation to the sundry civil appropriation bill was referred, and upon that question the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] is entitled to the floor.

HALLET KILBOURN—RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to submit a resolution which I think involves a question of privilege. I have been requested to offer it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas suit has been instituted for damages in the supreme court of the District of Columbia by Hallet Kilbourn against MICHAEL C. KERR, Speaker of this House, John G. Thompson, Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, and JOHN M. GLOVER, JEPTHA D. NEW, BURWELL B. LEWIS, and A. HERR SMITH, members of the same; and whereas said suit is predicated upon an alleged assault and false imprisonment of the said Kilbourn by the said defendants when the said Kilbourn was reported to this House by one of its committees as a recusant witness; and whereas it is the duty of this House to defend said suit: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said defendants be, and are hereby, instructed to confer with the Judiciary Committee and take such steps as to the employment of counsel and defense of said suit as said committee shall advise; said committee to fix the amount of attorney fees.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to add the words "at a reasonable rate." That would be an admonition that there shall not be lawyers employed at $25,000 apiece.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER.]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I ask leave to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some remarks in reference to general politics as a part of the proceedings of the House.

There was no objection, and leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

Mr. PIERCE. I ask leave to print some remarks in the RECORD as a part of the proceedings of the House on the question of a reciprocity treaty between the United States and Canada.

There was no objection, and leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, resumed the floor.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and it is when I shall have the right to move to lay this motion to reconsider on the table. It is a sham and a political humbug gotten up here to interfere with the business of the House. The country is not interested in any controversy between the North and South, and it is all a humbug. I desire to move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri must not attempt to hold the floor against the rules of the House or to make a speech when there is a gentleman on the floor who is entitled to it. He can make the motion he indicates whenever the floor is not occupied by some gentleman entitled to it.

Mr. BLAND. I want to know when I can be recognized. I have been trying to get the floor to-day without success.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not the fault of the Chair.

MORTGAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair appoints as managers of the conference on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3168) in reference to mortgages on real estate in the District of Columbia Mr. LAWRENCE, Mr. LORD, and Mr. HOAR.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1823) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Ella to that of Myra;

An act (H. R. No. 2252) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the steamboat Hiram Wood;

An act (H. R. No. 2894) for the relief of J. E. Pankey, of Fulton County, Kentucky;

An act (H. R. No. 2692) to relinquish the title of the United States to certain property in the city and county of San Francisco, California; and

An act (H. R. No. 4060) to provide for the payment of certain indebtedness incurred in the construction of the New York court-house and post-office building.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, from the same committee, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (S. No. 84) extending the time for the redemption of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted by unanimous consent as follows:

To Mr. BALLOU for one week from Friday next;

To Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire, an extension of ten days on account of sickness;

To Mr. WALSH indefinitely;

To Mr. MACKEY for three days on account of sickness in his family;

To Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, indefinitely;

To Mr. CAMPBELL for ten days on account of serious illness;

To Mr. HOGE for ten days on account of sickness;

To Mr. SMALLS indefinitely from the 10th instant on account of important business;

To Mr. HENKLE for two days on account of important engagements;

To Mr. MACDOUGALL for two weeks from the 10th instant on account of important private business;

To Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, indefinitely from Thursday next;

To Mr. FENN for four days from Monday next; and

To Mr. HARRISON indefinitely.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. LUTTRELL asked and obtained unanimous consent for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Charles Krugg, of San Francisco, California.

MANAGEMENT OF GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the petition of Alexander Moffit, Theodore F. Wilson, James M. Thompson, and 22 others, citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the appointment of a joint committee of three members, one from the Senate and two from the House of Representatives, to continue and finish the investigation of the charges made against the management of the Government hospital, the same having been partially considered and some proof taken, as stated and shown by this petition and evidence annexed; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

ISSUE OF ARTIFICIAL LIMBS.

Mr. RUSK. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 1516) to regulate the issue of artificial limbs to disabled soldiers, seamen, and others. That bill has been returned from the Senate with sundry amendments, and I desire to move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and request a conference upon the disagreeing votes thereon.

No objection being made, the motion of Mr. RUSK was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will announce to-morrow the managers of the conference on the part of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I cannot yield further except for a motion to adjourn, if that is the wish of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 1035 be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Many MEMBERS. ["Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called for, the question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITION.

The following petition was presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina: Remonstrance of Robert Tramper, chairman of council, and others, of the eastern band of North Carolina Cherokee Indians, against the adoption of the amendment of Senator WINDOM to the Indian appropriation bill, and also against the appointment of an agent for said band as provided by House bill No. 3478, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 10, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

NATIONAL SAVINGS BANK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual statement of the National Savings Bank of the District of Columbia for the year ending December 31, 1875, as required by section 8 of the act incorporating the bank, approved May 24, 1870; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION INVESTIGATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for printing copies of the report of the Special Committee to Investigate the late Election in Mississippi.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was to add after the word "Senate," at the close of the resolution, the words:

And House of Representatives; 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

So as to read:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 4,000 copies of the report of the Special Committee to Investigate the late Election in Mississippi, with the views of the minority, be printed for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives; 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,500 copies for the use of the House.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Let the original resolution be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That 4,000 copies of the report of the Special Committee to Investigate the late Election in Mississippi, with the views of the minority, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The House amend it how?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As amended it gives the Senate fifteen hundred copies and the House twenty-five hundred.

Mr. MORRILL. That will amount to this: It will give the Senate fifteen hundred copies and then leave half or at least some of the others to go to the old waste-paper dealers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3964) granting a pension to Annie Gibson Yates was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) authorizing the Secretary of State to publish a history of the several surveys and scientific expeditions by the United States during the present century was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

PAVING OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

The bill (H. R. No. 4085) to repeal part of section 5 of an act entitled "An act authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue," approved July 19, 1876, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that the bill lie on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And let it be printed.

Mr. SPENCER. I think it had better go to the Committee on the District of Columbia, for another bill exactly like it is before that committee.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill provides for the repeal of that portion of the act authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue which fixes the date at which the work shall be completed at some period early in December. A communication has been received from the commissioners for the repaving, in which they say it is impossible that the work can be done in the most advantageous manner if that provision is retained; that while the time may be sufficient the continuation of wet weather or some other contingency might arise which would render it very desirable that the period should be extended. They have expressed a wish that the limitation be repealed, and I suggest, if the Senator from Alabama has no special objection, that, inasmuch as a reference would delay the action upon this measure, and as the commissioners have already opened the bids and desire to make their award, the bill had better lie upon the table, in order that early action may be had upon it.

Mr. SPENCER. I will state to the Senator from Kansas that a great many property-owners on the Avenue have protested in a written protest against the extension of this time. The Committee on the District of Columbia had a bill worded exactly like this up at its last meeting, of which this bill is a copy. The committee were somewhat divided on it and have sent the bill to the commissioners of the District of Columbia for their opinion upon it. Until we have heard from them, we do not want to take any action. I think the bill had better go to the committee, and if the committee decide upon it favorably they can report it back very soon.

Mr. INGALLS. The commissioners for the repaving having asked for the passage of this bill, I ask for its present consideration by the Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. What is the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. It is a bill for repealing a portion of the act authorizing the repavement of the Avenue, removing the limitation that was prescribed in that act requiring the work to be performed and completed by the 1st of December. The commissioners in their communication state that while the time may be sufficient, yet in case there should be protracted wet weather it might be impossible to have the work done within the time specified. If the Senate should think it advisable that the restriction should be removed, it certainly ought to be done at once, because the day of adjournment is rapidly approaching and it is not probable that the committee could take any action upon the matter before that time arrives.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to inquire of either of the gentlemen whether a letter from these commissioners was not addressed to the committees of the two Houses suggesting that this limitation be repealed?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERNAN. Has that letter been laid before the Senate?

Mr. INGALLS. I am not aware as to that.

Mr. SPENCER. It has not been.

Mr. KERNAN. Where was it sent?

Mr. SPENCER. It was sent to the committee; it is in the hands of the committee.

Mr. KERNAN. I have heard complaint outside that that request had been sent in but had not got before the Senate. I found in a newspaper that they had asked that this limitation should be repealed with a view to get good work done.

Mr. SARGENT. It would be better to let the bill go to the committee, and they can report it back to-morrow morning.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope this bill will be allowed to pass. I do not understand that there is any great apprehension that more time will be required: but if there should be a long season of wet weather during October it might be impossible to complete the work in the best manner by the time limited. I think there can be no objection to it, for I do not understand that the commissioners propose to avail themselves of it unless it is absolutely indispensable to good work.

Mr. KERNAN. I think we ought to repeal the limitation.

Mr. MORRILL. I think so.

Mr. KERNAN. I think it is the only way to get fair bids and to get good work done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SPENCER. I object. I am sorry to object, because I do not know that I am opposed to the bill; but the committee have already considered the subject, and of those present a majority of the committee were opposed to the passage of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Alabama is certainly a little disingenuous in speaking about the committee, because he is aware that there has been no quorum of the committee present to act upon the bill; and he ought not to produce or leave the impression upon the Senate that there has been any action by the committee.

Mr. SPENCER. I said a majority of those present; I did not say a quorum. I think the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] will bear me out in the statement that it is correct.

Mr. ALLISON. Will one objection carry the bill over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One objection will carry it over.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that one objection cannot carry it over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has just been read the second time, and the third reading cannot be on the same day if there is objection.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that under the rules it is within the power of the Senate to order that the three readings shall occur on the same day.

Mr. CONKLING. O, no; a bill can be read only once on one day except by unanimous consent.

Mr. INGALLS. Unless the Senate shall order otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that the bill may lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope it will be referred with the understanding that it is to be reported back to-morrow or at an early day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It had better be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the bill lie on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. A motion is now in order to refer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill No. 3022.

Mr. CONKLING. Without taking up any time, I wish to remark that that bill will lead to debate, which I prophesy will exhaust the morning hour and something more. I do not mean to object to the motion, but I think if the Senator would allow the Calendar to be taken up and called for unobjected cases for a while, he can get in his appropriation bill whenever he chooses; but if he insists upon it now, I shall not object.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think this report will lead to any protracted debate. If it does I will give way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to take up the conference report on the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

Mr. SPENCER. I wish the Senator from Iowa would give way a moment that I may call up a House joint resolution which was on its third reading when it was up the last time.

Mr. ALLISON. This report will take but a few moments, and there will be plenty of time after we get through with it.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator yield then?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He must yield to somebody. We cannot have claims filed at this period of the session.

Mr. SPENCER. It will take but a moment, and will the Senator not yield to me now?

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I will yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate take up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 100) providing a commission to frame a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not think there is any necessity for reporting it again. I think every Senator has heard it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution, as amended, will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to ask one question, for fear I shall be appointed on the commission. I believe every Senator and member of Congress, who takes an office under the United States, loses his seat; and here you fix by law the duties of certain people who are made commissioners. It is true you appoint them by the presiding officers of the two Houses; you select that method, calling them heads of department, I suppose; but I want to put in a caveat in advance that I beg the Chair not to oust me from my seat by appointing me on this commission.

Mr. COCKRELL. Have the amendments been concurred in?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments have been concurred in; the joint resolution was on its third reading before and has been read the third time to-day. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 13, noes 18; no quorum voting.

Mr. SARGENT. Let the vote be taken again.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that the objection that has been made to the joint resolution defeats it. Had he not better let it go over and improve it?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Alabama had better withdraw it.

Mr. SPENCER. I am anxious to dispose of it in some way or other.

Mr. SARGENT. Are we voting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators concurring in the passage of the joint resolution will rise and stand until they are counted.

Mr. SPENCER. I will withdraw the joint resolution and let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution goes over. The conference report on the river and harbor bill is before the Senate.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When I asked that the report be read I had forgotten that we had a statement which showed how it came out. I do not ask that all that report be read for myself.

Mr. ALLISON. The statement is printed in the RECORD of August 8, page 42.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have that read. I do not care about taking up the time of the Senate to read the report. It is the result where it is grouped together that I want.

Mr. ALLISON. I send the statement to the Clerk to be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ADDITIONS.

Dunkirk, New York	$18,000
Great Sodus, New York	5,000
Pultneyville, New York	3,000
Saugatuck, Michigan	3,000

Galveston Bar, Texas	8,000

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa how much this bill foots up, this report being agreed to?

Mr. ALLISON. This bill foots up exactly $5,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is meeting your most sanguine expectations, I suppose?

Mr. ALLISON. It appropriates not one cent more or less.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish to wage any debate on this subject; but I feel moved to make one or two observations.

The conference committee, in revising the bill, have, as I understand it, transplanted from place to place different appropriations and parts of appropriation in order I suppose to make it as nearly agreeable all around as the amount of money would permit, or as a classical friend near me expresses it, they have put the money where it would do the most good. In making that arrangement, the committee in their wisdom and charity have taken, for example, from the appropriation to remove rocks in Long Island Sound $40,000. I mean no offense, I hope I shall give none, when I say that a more unwise, a more indefensible change than that could not have been made in the length and breadth of this bill. There is a work which concerns everybody, literally everybody interested in foreign commerce or in coastwise commerce; and to justify that remark I mention one fact which has not been mentioned, I believe during this debate, in my hearing. Those rocks may be no more plainly seen on any chart of the Coast Survey than they can be seen in the tariff of marine insurance. There they stand not only in the throat of Long Island Sound, but there they stand as a danger raising the rates of marine insurance every day in the year, as my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] knows probably better than I do.

There are expensive preparations, costly apparatus, extensive arrangements made to carry on this work. The appropriation as it stood was inadequate; it was uneconomical; it was in violation of the principles of common sense and business-like proceeding which every private individual, every corporation would observe in such a case. And although the appropriation was thus inadequate, thus fell short of a wise and enlightened economy, the committee, in order to reconcile something somewhere else, in order to poultice some other distant bruise in some locality, intending to be mathematically exact, laid down their rule on the bill and measured five million dollars, neither more nor less, but provided that it should not vary even in the estimation of a hair; and then take off $40,000 from this stinted and neglected work of obvious national and universal importance; that work which I may say more emphatically and fully than any other one in this bill falls within the domain of Congress and its power and duty in making internal improvements. They take from that work, thus only partially regarded as the bill stood, $40,000 to peddle it out here and there and somewhere else round about in order to avoid friction, to pacify, tranquilize, if not satisfy, the various demands of various localities.

Mr. EATON. I should like to say to my friend from New York that on a little estimate which I have made boats of a capacity of not less than 50,000 tons from my State, the State of Massachusetts, and the State of Rhode Island every twenty-four hours have to pass through and over that channel. In my judgment, more than 60,000 tons pass, but I say 50,000 so as to be very moderate, taking the three States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut; and every little while one of those boats will be found lying on the rocks; and this, as the Senator from New York has just remarked, causes increased rates of insurance.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, Mr. President, if every Senator has heard that statement, it is a more cogent one than I can make. There is a transit of 50,000 tons daily from three States and a transit daily of boats from every State whose boats are engaged in the coastwise or in the sea-going trade, and as the Senator says every once in a while there is a disaster, by which large amounts of property are lost, lives endangered, and by which a burden and tax by way of marine insurance, speaking of nothing else, is imposed upon every freighter, every consignor, every consignee, every owner of cargo upon whom insurance falls.

I might speak of other things which have occurred in the State of New York; but, as I say, I do not wish to consume the time of the Senate, and I speak of this one. I have no doubt the committee have done what they thought best under the circumstances. I believe they have made in this respect, and not in this respect alone, a very grave error; and I believe that this bill as it stands contains items amounting not only to tens of thousands and to hundreds of thousands, but I think I may say to millions, which, compared with neglected or partially neglected works, are of very small merit, and I believe there are many appropriations in the bill which never should be found in any river and harbor bill and for which it would be very difficult for any man who understands the meaning of the Constitution in that respect as I do to vote. But as I say I rose only to signify the objections which I had in some general respects to this report.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to unite with what my colleague has said in reference to the work he has specified and in reference to another work. In this bill as it passed the Senate there were $66,000 appropriated for the improvement of the Hudson River, and, as will be remembered, quite a large part of it to do certain dredging in front of the Jersey City shore, and all of it within the Hudson River where the tide ebbs and flows, where there are custom-houses, and where there is a large commerce not only through the State from the West, but coastwise with other States. Sixteen thousand dollars is taken from this, and the original appropriation for the entire river in front of Jersey City and other places mentioned during the debate was only $66,000, and it is reduced to $50,000.

I wish to ask the Senate whether in any view of the principle on which these appropriations for rivers and harbors are made, we should take from a work like Hell Gate, which my colleague has described, $40,000, when we know from information direct that the engineers in charge of that important work believe that they would be greatly embarrassed in carrying it on and finishing what they desire to do immediately even if you left the original appropriation of $290,000? It is here reduced to $250,000. I fear it will greatly embarrass this work, postpone for a considerable time the enjoyment of the advantages to commerce, not merely as to internal trade but the commerce of the ocean, which it is hoped will be derived from this work. This report takes from the great works that in every sense of the term are national objects for the benefit of national commerce, when there is but a scanty appropriation for them and to carry on works long since commenced, and distributes it elsewhere, distributes it to carry on what by this bill I say are attempted to be carried on, internal works for the aid of internal navigation.

I am not going to depreciate any works in the few minutes that I ask the attention of the Senate, nor do I mean to get into any collision with the notion as to what States should get. I do not think we should at all look to what States get except as we find within the borders of a State rivers and harbors which fairly come within the idea of national objects for the advantage of commerce generally. I had thought that we went a great way in attempting to appropriate money from the national Treasury to carry on works strictly for improving navigation in States, interior States; but if we have got to the point where we will take from scanty appropriations for great national works, like those for the coast of Texas or those in the harbor of New York and give to inferior and local works, then we are entirely departing from the original and correct idea of what can be done by the national Government, and not only are we departing from it, but we are taking from national works, taking from those long commenced and of great importance in a national point of view and beginning works far in the interior which are really nothing but aiding States to develop their internal resources. I trust that we shall not add this with all the other objections to this bill, taking from these works on the Hudson and at Hell Gate and putting the money elsewhere.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, the Senator from New York thinks it is a matter of grievance that $16,000, which was to be used to dredge in front of some wharves in Jersey City——

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me. Do not get that idea. I said I considered this a departure and a very flagrant one from correct principles of legislation; and did not object to it merely because it affected my State.

Mr. SARGENT. My friend, if I can quote him literally, considers it improper not to take $16,000 out of the Treasury to dredge the Hudson in front of the wharves on the Jersey shore. That is what it amounts to. If there is anything wrong in developing the internal resources of this country, in making the Mississippi what it was designed by nature with a little aid to become, a great highway, as well as might be New York Harbor or Long Island Sound to reach the city of New York, or improve the tributaries of that great stream, they being easily made navigable by such work, it certainly must be wrong to take Government dredge-boats and Government money to dredge out in front of the wharves opposite Jersey City. That is not a great national undertaking, and it ought not to be so considered. We give $50,000, and every dollar of it is to be used for dredging out the Hudson; but I doubt if dredging can be done at all by the Government, except in completing its work where it is necessary to make an original channel. Let commerce, after the works have been built, take care of itself in the way of dredging. That is done at nearly every harbor in the United States outside of this proposition to dredge around the wharves of Jersey City.

The other Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] thinks that this committee have by some sleight of hand robbed the appropriation for Hell Gate of $40,000. There are a quarter of a million dollars appropriated in this bill, one-twentieth of the whole bill, for that single work. Is not that enough? It is nearer to the estimate than any other appropriation in the bill, and what is the condition of the work?

Mr. CONKLING. I wish my friend would answer that question himself. Does he think it enough?

Mr. SARGENT. I do. I think it is enough, provided any sum in the bill is enough, and I think it is enough because the rock that is to be removed has been chambered now throughout its whole extent and it only stands on a few frail pillars, and is now being charged with dynamite and powder in order to blow it up, and very little more of economical work is necessary upon it. In the course of two weeks or thereabouts, or early in September, the fire is to be put to the explosive materials and the rock is to be blown into the air, and it is entirely a question of experiment whether it will so fall that it will require scarcely any considerable expense at all, or whether it will so fall that considerable expense will be required; and a quarter of a million of money certainly ought to be enough to go very far toward pulling away the débris that will remain from the falling of this rock when the engineers themselves suppose it will fall in such a way that there will be very little débris to remove at all.

There are two Houses interested in this bill. The first thing the House conferees declared to us was that they would not require the Senate conferees to increase the bill over $5,000,000. That was the first proposition. Then the question was how should that be distributed. The Senator from New York made several speeches on this bill, and in every one of them, if my memory serves me correctly, he dwelt with great importance on the harbor at Dunkirk. He said in reference to Hell Gate that it was not a New York institution; that it concerned the nation; he did not feel interested in that; he ought not to defend it any more than any other member of the committee or the Senate; that was an affair of national concern; it was in our hands, not especially in his. That was the manner in which he talked about Hell Gate, and I certainly did not expect this morning that when the report came here giving a quarter of a million on national considerations for Hell Gate the Senator would consider that it was his duty particularly to champion that work. But what did he champion? Let us see.

Dunkirk is the terminus of the Erie Railway, and but one fact known to me diminishes the importance which used to attach to the harbor of Dunkirk. In recent years the Erie Railroad has built a branch to Buffalo, and as that branch sends cars to the elevators in Buffalo, which as we all know are very superior elevators, where those cars can be loaded in bulk with corn and wheat cheaply and with surprising quickness, many propellers running to carry cargoes in bulk of wheat and corn that formerly plied to Dunkirk go now to Buffalo. The withdrawal of a part of that single branch or item of the carrying-trade is the only fact known to me rendering Dunkirk now less important as a harbor than Dunkirk ever was or might have promised in the past to be. Notwithstanding this diversion, Dunkirk remains a very important harbor; and between Buffalo and Dunkirk—between Buffalo and Dunkirk there is no harbor on Lake Erie. In respect therefore of the safety of vessels, in respect of its trade, in respect of all that makes a harbor valuable and necessary, Dunkirk is an important harbor. The first amendment, I repeat, withholds from Dunkirk all appropriation whatever. It appropriates nothing either to continue the work or to preserve the harbor, or to shield from the action of the elements the work already done and incomplete.

See how the Senator repeats the word over and over again; it was necessary perhaps to make himself intelligible, but it shows his interest in the subject—

Might not the committee's mind be impressed that this was the great want of New York; that Dunkirk, the word that he repeated here twenty times in as many lines, was the thing that was upon the soul of our friend from New York; and that if there was to be any poulticing there was where the poultice should be applied in order to alleviate his feelings? I appeal to the Senator from New York himself if that was not the prominent idea which ran through that portion of his speech? Dunkirk! Always Dunkirk; and Hell Gate was a thing which he would commit to the general mercy of Congress. It said further:

I do not state these facts, as Senators might suppose, for the purpose of opposing this amendment. Considering the strait of this bill, considering the condition of the country and of the Treasury, I do not feel warranted, because of an amendment which I regret so much as this, in attempting to overset or aid in overthrowing the work of the committee; but I call attention to it thus early for two or three reasons, one of which will suffice. If concurring now in this amendment the Senate shall hereafter go back and refuse to concur in other reductions or in other instances in which appropriations are stricken out, I do not wish to be held inconsistent when I maintain, as I shall, that if the Senate refuses to concur with the committee and begins to add to this bill, in the case of local improvements or even of general improvements, this improvement is conspicuously one in which the Senate, should it adopt that line of action, ought to revise the recommendation of the committee.

Then comes a long paragraph that I will not take time to read, showing the importance of the harbor of Pultneyville and then the harbor of Great Sodus Bay. All these are dwelt on by the Senator as being of great importance; and when the House, speaking as they had a right in their own behalf, desired some re-arrangement of the items of this bill, (and a very little re-arrangement was made,) the committee on the part of the Senate having in mind these impressive considerations advanced by the Senator from New York, insisting that Dunkirk first and second Pultneyville and third Great Sodus, which three it seemed so important to the Senator should be taken care of, had the appropriations made in this way. It seems to me that it might be considered that the Senator was a little ungrateful for the poulticing that was done to him at the very place where he asked it to be applied when he now comes in and complains of the committee. I say the House of Representatives, this Hell Gate operation being a national work, in the language of the Senator from New York, and committed to the care of the whole country and not immediately to the Senators from New York, thought that a quarter of a million of dollars was sufficient for it. The original appropriation by the House was only $200,000. We increased it to $290,000, and by compromise saved most of the increase, bringing it to $250,000.

I say for this reason that it seems to me the attacks which are made on this report by the Senators from New York are not well founded. I know that estimates are frequently much larger than in the wisdom of Congress ought to be appropriated for given objects. If you run all through the Book of Estimates you will find that the Departments ask more money than Congress ever gives. The very estimates of the engineers to which the Senator [Mr. CONKLING] would apply in order to show that more money ought to be given to this national object call for $14,000,000, while the Senate has considered that only $5,000,000 will suffice. I simply say that we have given more in proportion to Hell Gate in consideration of its being a national enterprise than we have to any other work named in the bill.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I suppose eighteen yards of calico is a full pattern for a dress; I do not know exactly what it is, it is so long a time since I followed dress-making, [laughter;] but a mother who has half a dozen full-grown daughters for whom she wants to make dresses starts out with the resolution that she will buy but thirty yards for them all must not think strange if some of the dresses are not flounced as deeply as they ought to be. No man sympathizes more acutely than I do in such complaints as we have just listened to from the Senators from New York, and nobody enjoys such complaints better than I do at the present time. I thought this Senate was acting somewhat like a mistaken mother of a large family when it settled down upon the obstinate resolution not to expend but $5,000,000 of money during the next year in the interests of commerce throughout this broad Republic. I hope we shall learn wisdom from the result of this one experiment.

I do not underestimate the value of this improvement at Hell Gate to the commerce of the nation or to the commerce of the world at all. I say in view of its importance it is simply scandalous, it presents the Republic in the attitude of a pauper when she is dealing out small sums of money made up of small bills, in order to make this improvement in the course of a series of years for which the commerce of the country is bleeding every day. There is a certain amount of money which can be mechanically expended, I take it, upon a work of that sort in a given year, and the Republic is robbing itself when it withholds a dollar of the money which can be so expended; because, I protest, it makes no difference to the people of this country whether you expend $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 in a single year; the tax-payer would never know the difference. I hope next year we shall avoid all such obstacles as we have stumbled over on this occasion. So that, although I agree these complaints of my friends from New York are admirably well founded, I think there is no way of avoiding them this year; but if they are remembered I think we may avoid them next year. We undertook to restrict our appropriations to too small a sum, and then expect so many girls to be clothed by the expenditure of that sum.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, if this were understood to be the last river and harbor appropriation bill ever to be passed by Congress, I should see much force in the reasoning of the Senators from New York and Connecticut; but I take it for granted such is not the expectation of any Senator here; and in my opinion, although I am not so well posted perhaps as they are upon that point, the season is so far gone already, nearly two-thirds of it already past, that the appropriation as it now stands will be sufficient until another appropriation bill shall have passed Congress. This is all I wish to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I suppose it is entirely useless to say anything more upon the subject of the total amount of money that is to be expended by this bill. It evidently, I suppose, will not do any good to refer to the fact that on the idea, or profession, I will not say pretense, of a great state of public necessity and smallness of funds in the Treasury, we have cut down all the branches of the Government in respect of efficiency and capacity to perform their duties, have raked through every Department in order to economize as we call it, and confessedly to the present detriment of the public service by which everybody having relations with the Government of the United States is delayed and put off, accounts are not settled, and the public interest suffers from the fact that they are not settled, and yet when it comes to appropriating money afresh to make the rivers and harbors of this country better this year than they were last or in any year before, there is no use in talking about economy and saving money. A large majority of this Senate without respect to party, or, if in respect to party by a very large proportion of those who consider themselves the particular economists of the time, have determined that, notwithstanding all that has been said about other topics and all we have done and the reasons for it, this thing must go; and taking that for granted, as it will go against my vote, I only rise now to call attention to one item that appears in this bill and in respect of which there was considerable discussion the other day; and it is a typical item, because if you had the time and means of examination you would find that a good many other items stand in much the same way, and that is the east pier of Cleveland where $8,000 of this hard-earned money wrung from the tears and blood and bone and sinew of the tax-payer, as the phrase of economists is on all the other bills, is to be appropriated for the east pier.

Since that discussion took place I have received an unofficial letter from an officer of the engineers at Buffalo, New York, upon this subject; an officer who simply happened to write to me from the circumstance that I was perhaps unduly conspicuous in endeavoring to protect what I thought to be the interests of the United States respecting that work, in which he says this:

In reading the Senate debate on the subject of repairs of Cleveland east pier, I notice that some Senators spoke of a "quarrel" between the "engineer in charge" and the railroad company as to who should make the repairs. Allow me to say that this is an entire misconception. When last year some suggestions were made to me about some repairs, my answer was that there were no funds for that object. I did not think it necessary to re-open the old question.

Next, further damages took place, due, as far as I can learn, in part to the dredging done by the city alongside the pier, which, being too deep, caused some of the stones to fall in.

Next came the question who was to repair the damage. The city did not wish to, because it received no wharfage from the railroad company for the use of the pier. Of course it will be a nice thing for the company to have the United States repair and keep in order a pier, or rather a wharf, which is used almost exclusively by that company, and that is what the company is aiming at. This part of the old pier is now of very little use as a harbor pier in my opinion. Since it was built the pier proper has been extended far out into the lake, and the shore line is out nearly as far as this old part.

Now I omit two or three lines that do not bear on this subject, and therefore it is unnecessary to read them. The gentlemen of the committee, however, have seen the whole letter.

I do not see that my report on the subject is among the papers before the Senate. I would abandon the whole of this part of the pier. The difficulty is to whom? If to the city, it will make the railroad company pay wharfage, (very properly, I think.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Chair would be good enough to let me finish the letter, subject to a call for the regular order, of course. I do not wish to displace that.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate to lay aside the regular order temporarily to finish this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have the floor at present.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to disturb the Senator; but after the Senator shall have finished what he has to say, I shall make the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The letter proceeds:

The company now has the (almost) exclusive use of this portion of the pier gratis. The United States does not want it, in my opinion. The case is not a new one. At other harbors where the shore-line has made out the original piers have become unnecessary, and have been abandoned by the United States and no further repairs made upon them.

Just what General Cram predicted in 1865 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD August 3, page 19) has come to pass. The repairs now necessary, not for the safety of the harbor, but for the convenience of the railroad company, will cost more than the company want to pay. Hence the "loud call on the Government." I have of course no interest in the matter, but I conceive it my duty to oppose the expenditure of public funds for private purposes. I know of more than one instance on the lakes where a single individual, or a single firm having an ax to grind at an insignificant village, obtained first a survey, then an appropriation, and I can name a harbor on this lake where a member was elected simply on the "appropriation" issue, and is threatened with the loss of renomination if he fails to secure one; this at a harbor so petty that the light-house was abandoned some years ago.

The idea of the very breakwater which has been commenced at Cleveland was, I believe, started as a help to election by a former member of Congress, and the changes rung upon it in the papers with that object. My own private opinion is that Cleveland could get along very well without it, and as a "harbor of refuge" "the game is not worth the candle."

To repeat, I regret that this item has been passed by the Senate, as I cannot help considering it as practically a gratuity to a railroad company.

Respectfully yours.

It would not have been worth while probably, except from what took place before, inasmuch as I presume it is perfectly useless and hopeless to try to do anything about it, to have said anything about this, but for what this gentleman mentions as to this being a type of a good many other instances where there are loud calls on the public Treasury in the interest of great national commerce which is to tinker up some little river that empties into some lake or the sea, or some little river that is found away in the mountains where voters are to be conciliated by Senators and Members of Congress. Of course it is perfectly manifest to everybody who knows us and the gentlemen of the other House that we never have any such idea. I am almost ashamed to make the explanation because it must be so obvious to everybody. Of course there is not a Senator or Member of the other House who would ever think of allowing a dollar of public money to be spent in his State except for an object of the highest public importance, although if that high public importance should happen to be his election, it is just possible that there is where the public interest would come in.

But to return now for a moment to this general question. I am going to vote, if I have an opportunity, against agreeing to this conference report; not that it may not be as well as the conferees could have done under the circumstances. I do not take a moment to make any special criticism upon that. I have not even examined it. I take that for granted; but when we have united by our action in this body in the raid and foray that has been started this winter about a great state of public distress and a great paucity in the Treasury and that in every possible way the people's money was to be saved by keeping it, and not spending it, even if you pay people whom you employ to do work only half of what they are fairly entitled to earn and what they need for the support of themselves and their families, I am unwilling to be a party to taking $5,000,000 of this same money in order to make the rivers and harbors of this country, even if it would do it, as I have shown it will not in a good many instances, better than they have been ever before. If you would appropriate a million or two to protect and preserve what we have and save our money until there is greater prosperity and a more full Treasury, there would be sense in it. As it stands, it appears to me to be wholly detrimental to public interests, and so I am going to vote against it.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to lay aside the regular order and continue the consideration of this report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS and Mr. SHERMAN. Subject to a call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be continued subject to call for the regular order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Vermont uses this river and harbor bill as a lever to enable him better to present the unwise and unfair parsimony which has been manifested by Congress in the general appropriation bills, I like his speech; but if he means to say that $5,000,000 is too much to devote to this important purpose, I must meet him with an argumentum ad hominem; for if I remember rightly it was the Senator from Vermont who, in the motion to instruct the committee, inserted the sum of $5,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, if my friend will allow me, I did; but I first moved to insert I think three and then four and then five and then five and a half millions, the House having it six, in order to see if it was possible that anything could be saved in this performance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think the first motion was five millions and subsequently my friend offered three and four.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; the first motion was three and the next four.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The first was five, I think.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, the first was to appropriate three or four millions, I have forgotten which, to be expended by the Secretary of War in conformity with the act of 1869.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That may be so; but in the instruction to the committee the sum was five millions. I think it is not well to follow a bad example. I think that this country is perfectly able to make adequate appropriations to all the purposes of the Government, and I really think the fact that we have failed in that particular is no reason why we should not make this reasonable appropriation of $5,000,000 to this purpose.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, few days on which the Senate sits fail to give me fresh reasons to admire the honorable Senator from California on my left, [Mr. SARGENT.] This day is not an exception. I admire his ability, his alertness, his acquaintance with legislation, his usefulness, and the alacrity with which he performs the much labor cast upon him. I say this day gives me fresh occasion to admire him. To-day he has looked up and read a considerable portion of a speech of my own, and I commend the taste which that displays in him for sound doctrine. It shows that he is inclined to resort to reliable sources of fact and information, not to speak of advice. Indeed until the Senator associated his own elocution with what I said, I had no idea myself that I had so truly and properly presented the case in respect of the harbor of Dunkirk; and therefore I am obliged to him for reproducing that; and, as I say, I admire the disposition on his part which it evinces to profit by all the sources of information, and especially those which are reliable, open to him.

My honorable friend, as the chief mission of his address to the Senate, undertook to involve me in some inconsistency touching the appropriation for Hell Gate. Whether he succeeded in that, or not, is a matter too indifferent to the Senate to justify me in expending a moment upon it. But he undertook also to show, and fortified his argument with his opinion, that the appropriation made in the bill for the work in question was adequate and suitable, and he even undertook to enable us to understand why and how that is so.

Now, Mr. President, I call attention first of all to the report of the engineer which I put on the record by the side of the explanation of the Senator touching the work to be done in Long Island Sound and the cost and condition of it.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. Will he be kind enough to inform me if he knows how much the appropriation was for the last year? If he does not——

Mr. CONKLING. I will hand the Senator this book when I finish reading it, and he can read it for himself.

Mr. SARGENT. It was just the amount that is now appropriated by this bill, $250,000, when there was a year's additional work to be done to what there is now, and without objection on the part of the Senator last year $250,000 was appropriated for this purpose when the engineers then showed what was to be done. With the same logic as then, I say now exactly, this year especially is it true under the stringent instructions of the Senate that $250,000 is sufficient. If the Senator asks me if $250,000 is sufficient to finish the work, I do not say it is; I say it is a sufficient appropriation.

Mr. CONKLING. Having allowed my honorable friend to ask a question which he wanted to answer himself, and allowed him to answer it, I will show in a moment, as I think, how utterly he misconceives in supposing that because in a certain year with one condition of things a certain sum of money was adequate, therefore in another year upon a totally changed condition of facts he can argue that the same sum is necessary. My honorable friend might as well suppose that if a man was about to build a house and wanted to dig and lay the foundation in the fall and that required a thousand dollars as all he wanted that year, when it came next year to complete the structure a thousand dollars would be all that was necessary; he need only go back and say that all he expended last year when he was flush was a thousand dollars, and therefore what an absurdity to talk about expending $20,000 this year!

Let me turn back to what I was about to read:

Amount asked to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877:

Grappling rock at Hallett's Point	$150,000
Continuing work on Flood Rock	200,000
Work on Diamond Reef and Frying-Pan	100,000
	450,000

Now see what the engineer says:

These amounts designed for specific purposes are the least that can be asked for continuous and economical work.

That is what the engineer says there. But the honorable Senator says only $250,000 was expended last year, and that shows that only $250,000 is necessary this year!

I turn over and read a little further from this report:

As soon as the Hallett's Point drilling is completed, all the machinery there can be utilized for Flood Rock work.

I might read other passages but I forbear, having read enough to show the Senate two things; First, that here is a careful and critical estimate of three specific ascertained works, and that estimate amounts to $450,000; second, a statement that the apparatus, costly and expensive, applicable to this very peculiar work, because it is in a sense sui generis, when it has been used to complete one portion of it can all be transferred and utilized upon the other. I need not speak of the economy which is concerned in this last suggestion, I need not say to any Senator that the difference is vast between utilizing and employing all the material, apparatus, impedimenta for this great work after it is there, able as the engineers say they will be to do it, and do it this season, and allowing it to be dispersed and removed or laid up and disused and taken up in another year to be employed again.

Now, Mr. President, on this state of facts let me inquire what these committees did. Inasmuch as the Committee on Commerce made no formal report here for lack of a quorum, I have no right to say anything about that and I forbear. But the Committee on Appropriations, of which the honorable Senator from California is one of the ablest members,—and those who know him well understand that he does not neglect the matters committed to him—reported $350,000. On what did they base that report? They based it on the data in books of which this is one, a part of which I have read, which part is fortified by manifold statements, by diagrams, cuts, ocular presentations of the stage, shape, condition, magnitude, character, and requirements of this great work. Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars was the sum reported. That was cutting down the estimate sent not on a survey referring to a future work, not a speculative estimate in futuro as most of these are, but an estimate predicated of a work explored, understood, partially completed, honey-combed as the Senator has said speaking of a part of it, with a myriad of tiny tunnels or drill-holes in which explosives are to be carried. An estimate thus grounded, thus based, not resting in the nebulous expectation or conjecture of what might be, but ascertained by actual trial and experiment, asserted that $450,000 was the least sum that could be economically applied this year to continuous work. The committee reduced it $100,000, and reported as I have said $350,000. They came into the Senate. The Senate, impressed with the importance of this work, concurred in the amendment, did it not?

Mr. ALLISON. I think so.

Mr. CONKLING. So do I. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senate rejected all amendments reducing the bill and voted for all increasing it. That was the first farce.

Mr. CONKLING. There are a great many statements besides the one I am making, which are important; but it is one of my infelicities to be able to make only one at a time, and I was endeavoring at that moment to state to the Senate upon a hearing, for there was one, because I believe I have been taken to task for the frequency with which I have called attention to this work, and certainly it has not been done sub silentio, nor has it gone without understanding—the Senate on a hearing voted that $350,000 was the proper, just, and appropriate sum at this time to be devoted to that work. Then the Committee on Appropriations retired again, took the bill with them under instructions to reduce it to $5,000,000. Then it came back. But the committee did not make any such reduction as this. They reduced it, and it stood at $290,000. The Senate acted upon that. Then it went to a conference, and then came what politicians used to call "the shrieks of locality." My honorable friend from California has acquitted me of shrieking in that way, because he says very truly that I have insisted from the first that this work was not a local, endemic, circumscribed affair, which, even if I thought it right to snatch to see what could be gotten for a particular State from which a Senator comes, I would make the subject of such a procedure. I have said throughout, as he remarked, and I say now, that this is in the broadest sense a national work. As my friend from Massachusetts reminded me a few moments ago, it invokes both the powers embraced in the vagrant clause of the Constitution, the power to regulate commerce not only among the several States, but to regulate commerce with foreign nations. It does stand in the great gate-way of the kingdom; that great gate-way into which alone the Great Eastern could have touched our shores as she did not and could not. She must go around Montauk Point, and she did, and anchored above Hell Gate, not being able to come down by reason of the presence of that impediment which these engineers are seeking to remove. Therefore I fortify and confirm the Senator from California in saying that in every stage of this bill I have never insisted that, like some creek in States, which shall be nameless, this was a local work appealing to the heat and endeavor of local and sectional competition. I have left it where it is on the map and in the waters, a public, national work, not only of large, but of the largest concern in its application to people in numbers and to cargoes in value.

The Senate, I say, voted upon this amendment and upon the striking down of the whole bill to $5,000,000; voted that this work should be reduced to $290,000, and the committee of conference went out and hearing these complaints from interests which, I may say, are local—because the bill will bear me out that they had been skipped—the committee proceeded to take off $40,000 more so as to bring this appropriation down to a point, which I undertake to say upon the report of these engineers and upon my knowledge of it, is a sum which no private owner, no business man, no board of experts or composed of men of common sense, would allot to the work this year. Why? Because if the work is to be carried on continuously and economically, it requires more money. If it is not to be carried on in that way, and does not appeal strongly enough to Congress to make an appropriation to carry it on, we should not appropriate for it at all.

But the honorable Senator said—and he seemed to think he was speaking of all these works of which there are three—that honeycombed as the rocks had been with drill-holes, they were to be saturated with explosives, and when the explosion took place he said it was matter of speculation where these rocks would fall.

Mr. SARGENT. So the engineers themselves say.

Mr. CONKLING. So I was about to say, it is matter of speculation; you cannot tell where they will fall as exactly as you could tell where they would be laid in a stone wall for so much a perch if a mason was going to lay them up; but there is one thing you can tell, and you can tell that just as sure as the thing itself; that is, the law of gravitation. When these rocks are blown into the air they will fall down. There is not the slightest danger that they will fall up, nor any immediate probability that they will proceed on horizontal lines. And when they fall down, no matter exactly where they fall, they will fall in the track of a mighty commerce, they will fall in the throat of an arm of the sea, they will fall where they cannot lie without wrecking vessels, and accordingly the report of the engineer shows what will be necessary in removing the débris.

The Senator used an expression which I wish I could remember on this subject. It was very graphic for the levity which it ascribed to these rocks. His phrase was one which would lead a body to suppose that almost any one after this explosion took place might take them with the thumb and the finger or brush them out with a wisp-broom in some way or the other; but everybody who will look at these reports will understand that the area of these rocks is so great, the geological deposit to be extirpated is so ponderous and colossal that when it is blown up and separated by seams and fissures, you have come then only to the realization of the valuable part of this work, because if vessels are to run upon these rocks it matters very little to the rocks or the commerce of the country whether they lie one side up or whether they have been turned over in places by the explosion, and we do know that they will be there in substance, and the object of tearing them to pieces with giant powder is not to leave them there, but only to divide them into pieces no longer so heavy or imbedded in the earth that they cannot be moved or extracted by machinery.

Now, looking at this particular one of the three works, and at the other two works, the engineers have made this report; and the answer of the honorable Senator from California is that I talked about Dunkirk and seemed to make that a very pet object and that I said that Hell Gate was not a local object and that only $250,000 were used last year at this place in getting ready for the fruition and culmination of this work and, therefore, why do they want any more than $250,000 this year. Well, Mr. President, if it is satisfactory to the honorable Senator from California, I said before, and I want to repeat, that I have no doubt that he and every member of this committee did, in his own estimation, the very best he could do. I know from some experience with this bill, from having devoted some weeks to it myself in committee, that it was full of puzzles and perplexities. No Senator envies the task which has been put upon the Senator from California. I feel perfectly sure, and say it with the utmost sincerity, that that Senator exerted himself not only conscientiously but seriously to make the best arrangement of this bill possible; and I beg him to understand that in no respect, by the remotest or faintest implication, do I mean to suggest a doubt in that regard touching that honorable Senator or either of his associates on this committee. But, Mr. President, when I see in this bill, reported by a conference committee compelling us to take the whole bill in block or to vote against it, a diffusion of money to objects useful, of paramount importance, but made in such measure as to violate the principles of economy and the true interests of the Government; and when I turn to other pages and see in many a local instance appropriations made which, in my judgment, should never be made if the Treasury were overflowing with surplus revenue—appropriations, in my belief, not to be defended either as matter of business judgment and discretion, or of constitutional power,—then I do not feel that I owed an apology to the Senators composing the committee of conference or to anybody else for respectfully entering my protest against it.

I shall vote against this report for the reason that appropriating large sums of money, as I believe, where no money at any time should be appropriated, it also appropriates other large sums of money in such wise and with such application that the real ends and the justifiable ends to which they are to be devoted are not to be answered, or they are to be answered only in part, and that expensively to the detriment of the true interests of the Government and in violation of the real principles which ought to be observed.

Mr. SARGENT. I only desire to say a word or two to my friend from New York. He has a habit of disarming those who seem to be in opposition to him, and I must confess myself to be somewhat in that predicament. I did not desire to convict him of any inconsistency. I simply wished to show the operation of my own mind in remembering what he said in the RECORD. He dwelt with great stress upon the necessity to the interests of New York of the harbor of refuge at Dunkirk, which was not merely a harbor of refuge but a harbor of great commerce. He also thought the Senate committee had made a mistake in leaving out Pultneyville, and dwelt with great force on the Great Sodus. When the House conference insisted that a quarter of a million dollars was all that could be allowed for Hell Gate, the Senate conferees, remembering the position of the Senator, from New York, said, "It will not be enough; but we will not allow the amount to be taken from one State and given to another as a rule; but if there should happen to be a surplus after the reasonable wants of the State are satisfied, that may be distributed." Consequently we insisted that Dunkirk might go in and Pultneyville and Great Sodus, and I supposed that all the reasonable demands of the Senator from New York had been satisfied. He says, however, that a quarter of a million dollars is not enough. I cited the fact that a quarter of a million dollars was all that was appropriated last year and that was not the commencement of the work, but three-quarters of a million dollars had been already expended on it.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SARGENT. I will.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator does not want to make an erroneous statement.

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly not.

Mr. CONKLING. He makes a very erroneous one in what he has said about New York. He seems to think that this report has restored everything for New York.

Mr. SARGENT. We have restored Dunkirk, and Great Sodus, and Pultneyville.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly you have restored them, but you have not restored other works.

Mr. SARGENT. We have restored each of them. I know whereof I speak.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator not know that more has been taken from the State of New York in the aggregate, counting Hell Gate, than the Senate put on?

Mr. SARGENT. I say the endeavor was to answer the demands made by Senators in behalf of their States. The House insisted that a quarter of a million, the amount appropriated last year, was sufficient for this work. We looked at the estimates, and we found the estimates were $450,000. We looked at the estimates the year before and found they were $600,000, and Congress appropriated $250,000. It did not seem unreasonable that $40,000 should come off and the amount be reduced to a quarter of a million dollars when the estimates were only about two-thirds of what they were the previous year. Then we demanded that the statement made on the floor of the Senate in behalf of New York should be accepted before there should be considered any surplus to come off in the neighborhood of New York or anywhere else, and then we restored every harbor the Senator himself insisted upon, and then the amount is less than $20,000, some $16,000; which is the only matter the Senator seems to be making his point upon this morning.

I refer to the estimates of the engineer and his statements, which the Senator must have known, because they were before his committee for months before they unfortunately came to us; and I regret that they did. I am sorry we did not have the benefit of the Senator's great judgment in arranging the details of the bill; but by those reports before the committee the necessary estimate was $450,000. There came a stage in the progress of this bill when the amount was reduced to $290,000. I do not find that this reduction of $160,000 excited the solicitude of the Senator at that time for so national a work, while he still talked about Dunkirk, always Dunkirk, and Pultneyville, and Great Sodus. I do not desire to insist on this as an inconsistency, but I must say that it is a justification of our action in supposing, as $160,000 reduction did not excite the sensibility of the Senator that $40,000 would not produce that effect.

Mr. CONKLING. If I understand my friend he gets the idea that I turned a cold shoulder to Hell Gate.

Mr. SARGENT. I say, in other words, that this national work was confided to us and confided to our good judgment.

Mr. CONKLING. There is where I made my mistake.

Mr. SARGENT. Very likely the Senator may have made a mistake, though I have been trying to show him why we have done it. I still, however, think that the Senator ought to have shown his disapprobation of any reduction whatever. When the largest amount proposed was below the estimate said by the engineers to be absolutely necessary, he assented. The Senator is wrong or else I am wrong, and I dare say he is right, if one of us is in error. I find the engineers spoke as follows in 1874, when they had already run seven hundred and eighty feet of tunnel under this rock before that time.

Mr. CONKLING. Why do you read the report of 1874 when there is a report of 1875?

Mr. SARGENT. For several reasons; in the first place to show that in 1874 they estimated for $600,000 and we gave them a quarter of a million. Now they estimate for $450,000 and we give them still a quarter of a million, showing that the same authority which would condemn the reduction the year before—and I do not remember that there was any particular controversy over that—would condemn it now, and furthermore showing that the engineers are extravagant in their estimates. That is to say, they tell you the whole amount they think they can get. They estimated $14,000,000 for rivers and harbors this year. The engineer speaking about deep water and shallow water and the disposal of rocks there, says:

> The amount of stone grappled and removed was twenty-eight hundred and five cubic yards. This does not include the amount (which is unknown) raked from the surface into the deeper water on the sides of the reef.

To take the débris that falls there, as I understand it, the water on the sides of the reef is deep enough, and it could be decreased several feet without injuring the navigation of the harbor for vessels drawing twice the amount of water that the Great Eastern does. I understand that to be the fact. If the Senator controverts that, he may be right; but from my reading on the matter and from the discussions in the committee on both sides, by the House conferees and the Senate conferees, I am disposed to think I am correct in my understanding of this matter. In other words, we have given a quarter of a million of dollars to this work the same as last year, when every other appropriation has been reduced, and we have treated that as a matter of national importance.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say one word in reply to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] before the vote is taken. The Senator from Vermont, in commenting upon the bill, seems now, as heretofore, to lay particular stress upon the action of the committee with reference to the harbor at Cleveland, Ohio, where the committee had the misfortune of inserting an item of $8,000 for the repair of an old pier, and wherein the Senate concurred in the judgment of the committee, and wherein the House conferees made no objection, and therefore it was not a proper subject for the committee of conference to consider. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] stated some days ago that there was a little bit of a conflict with reference to this pier between the railroad company and the engineer in charge. I do not know how that may be, but I should think not, from the fact that this engineer takes pains to explain to the honorable Senator from Vermont, who has opposed this appropriation all the way through, by saying to him that there is no conflict, and writing him an elaborate letter on the subject. I suppose, of course, that this letter was written to the honorable Senator for the reason that if it had been written to the committee having charge of this bill the committee would have had that information and probably might have changed its judgment. The honorable Senator from Vermont says that he showed the letter to the committee. That letter was not shown to the committee until after this report was made and in the Senate. I merely state these facts for what they are worth; but this engineer was appealed to before by the several committees of Congress. He was appealed to by the Chief of Engineers to make a reduction in the estimates in his district, and in that reduction of estimates he assigns to the breakwater at Cleveland, Ohio, $50,000, and says that that sum will do. Now he writes a letter to an honorable Senator of this body, which letter is read here, stating that this breakwater at Cleveland, Ohio, is useless.

Mr. SHERMAN. That work was recommended by the board of engineers.

Mr. ALLISON. It was recommended originally by the Corps of Engineers. When this particular engineer is called upon for an estimate of reductions that may be made in his district on the basis of two-thirds of reduction he sends here under his own signature, which I have, a recommendation stating that $50,000 ought to be appropriated by Congress for this breakwater at Cleveland, but he now writes to the honorable Senator from Vermont that it is a useless and wasteful expenditure of public money, and not only so, but undertakes to impugn the motives of local Senators and Representatives in Congress in asking this appropriation, to say nothing of the inferential imputation upon the members of the committee who have undertaken in a fair and legitimate way to make just appropriations in this bill upon the best information attainable to them.

I make this statement in order that this engineer, who seems to be reading the debates in Congress, may have an opportunity of knowing at least what one member of the Senate thinks of him in sending letters to Senators instead of sending them through the regular military channels in order that they may reach the proper committees, and in time to influence their action. If he thinks this expenditure of money is wasteful, why does he not so report to his superior officials in time for use by committees, instead of sending private and unofficial letters to Senators at a period too late to be useful? But there is no particular harm (and I regret the Senator from Vermont is not here) in making this appropriation of $8,000 for this pier at Cleveland Harbor. All these appropriations are expended in the discretion of the Engineer Corps. Because we appropriate this money the Secretary of War is not, perforce of that appropriation, to expend the money. For any reason, either for its insufficiency or because this money is not needed at any particular place, it is within the discretion of the Secretary of War to withhold this expenditure. Therefore we are not to be charged here, and although we make a mistake in this appropriation of $8,000, which has been fully discussed and carefully examined, and although this mistake is made by Congress, it does not follow that perforce of this appropriation the expenditure must be made if it is a needless expenditure, although at the time the appropriation is made it appears to be required, as in case of this particular pier.

We have also provided in this very bill that the differences existing between this railroad company and the Government of the United States with reference to this pier shall be adjusted, and if they are not adjusted the Attorney-General of the United States shall take proper means to see that the interests of the Government are protected in this regard. Therefore it does not appear to me to be necessary to speak constantly of this pier at Cleveland, Ohio, as an example of the general character and nature of this bill.

I have one word to say with reference to Hell Gate. As was truly said by the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] the appropriation this year was as large as the appropriation last year. The estimate this year is $150,000 less than the estimate last year. The length of time within which this appropriation may be expended is only six months. These river and harbor appropriations are continuous appropriations; they are not appropriations like others for fiscal years. Therefore an appropriation made at the next session of Congress will take effect immediately upon the adjournment of Congress or upon the passage of the appropriation bill; so that this $250,000 is practically an appropriation for six months for this improvement at Hell Gate. If they could only expend profitably and economically as they estimate $450,000 in a year, they can expend profitably and economically then only $250,000 in six months. Whether this be a great national enterprise or local enterprise in which the Senator from New York is specially interested, we have given him and that particular improvement as large a sum as can be expended until Congress shall have another opportunity of making appropriations for that improvement.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Am I right in supposing that the Senator said that there were only two or three months remaining when work could be done at Hell Gate, thereby meaning that it went on only during the summer season?

Mr. ALLISON. I did not say that.

Mr. CONKLING. I thought the Senator said that. I wish to say to him, if he does not know it, that winter as well as summer is an advantageous time to do that work.

Mr. ALLISON. Not having said that, it is not necessary, of course, to reply to it. I said this: that last year, with an estimate of $600,000, $250,000 was appropriated. This year, with an estimate of $450,000, $250,000 is appropriated, and that when there are but six months left during which these appropriations may be expended until another appropriation can be made. This estimate was made for a year, and Congress will meet again in December.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the Senator to mean that it is an appropriation for six months?

Mr. ALLISON. That is what I mean; and that after that time another appropriation will be available.

Mr. CONKLING. How can the Senator mean that, when we are talking about the fiscal year, and the fiscal year does not end until the 1st of July? Is not that more than six months from this time?

Mr. ALLISON. I undertook to explain the fact that these river and harbor appropriations are not appropriations for fiscal years. They are continuous appropriations, and if we make an appropriation next year and that appropriation is passed on the 4th day of March, it is immediately available. It is not only available for the fiscal year beginning on the 1st day of July, 1877, but it can be entered upon on the 5th day of March.

Mr. CONKLING. Is not this appropriation available until next July?

Mr. ALLISON. This appropriation is available until it is exhausted, if it be next July or if it be ten years from this time.

Mr. CONKLING. Then why do you say there are only six months in which it can be expended?

Mr. ALLISON. I say the estimate was made for a year. This appropriation may be expended within six months, when another appropriation will be made available for Hell Gate. I do not wish to occupy time with reference to this bill. I only wish to say that the conference committee made the best adjustment of this bill possible. When we found there was a disposition on the part of the House to reduce the appropriation at Hell Gate, we insisted upon the appropriation at Dunkirk, as was stated by my colleague upon the committee, [Mr. SARGENT,] and the House also insisted upon it. They insisted that Dunkirk should be included within these appropriations, because the harbor at Dunkirk is open two or three weeks before the harbor of Buffalo is open, and they said the harbor of Dunkirk should, therefore, be maintained. The House insisted that Dunkirk should be kept in the bill and we agreed to it, and agreed to the reduction for Hell Gate. All of the different appropriations which have been changed by the conference committee amount in the aggregate to only $151,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Iowa, as I understand, to whom I showed the letter that I read from an engineer, while I was not present said that this gentleman had made a recommendation inconsistent with what he states in this letter. I ask the honorable Senator from Iowa to produce that recommendation in order that we may see whether it is inconsistent or not.

Mr. ALLISON. I have sent for it, I will state to the Senator, and in a moment will have it read at the Clerk's desk. I think I had it once; but I am not certain.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When I handed this letter to my honorable friend, and after he had read it and handed it back to me, he did not communicate to me that he was aware of any inconsistency; but I had the impression that he rather sympathized—of course it is not right for me to state private conversation, and I do not mean to state it—but I mean to say that I have the impression that he ought rather to sympathize with the suggestions made about the piers at Cleveland. But what I want to get at now as a matter of justice to a worthy public servant as to exactly where this inconsistency comes in, and this is supposed to be it:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Buffalo, New York, February 25, 1876.

Brigadier-General A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army, Washington, D. C.

GENERAL: After replying to the Department telegram of to-day in relation to the reduction of estimates, I found that I had misunderstood it and had only reduced the aggregate one-third instead of to one-third. I have consequently sent a second telegram, in which I suggest the following appropriations: Toledo, $75,000; Sandusky, $25,000; Cleveland, $50,000; Erie, $50,000; Buffalo, $85,000. Total, $285,000—

Being one-third of the Department estimates, ($855,000.)

It will be seen that I do not recommend a reduction at Erie.

Is there anything else in the letter that the Senator thinks touches this matter?

Mr. ALLISON. There is one other clause.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will read it clear through in order to be sure.

It is the only natural harbor on Lake Erie, and the only harbor Pennsylvania has on the lake, and needs constant attention. The work at Toledo and Sandusky cannot be economically executed with smaller sums than were granted last year. Cleveland can, I think, get along very well with the $50,000, which I estimate the same as last year.

Mr. ALLISON. That is all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend says that is all.

C. E. BLUNT,
Lieutenant-Colonel Engineers.

You will observe, Mr. President, that there is no hint here of anything about the east pier at Cleveland at all; and if you turn to the estimate which I suppose somewhere is in detail, I venture to assert—not merely do I believe, but I venture to assert, though without the knowledge myself—that there is no estimate anywhere in the Engineer Department from this gentleman of anything for the east pier at Cleveland.

Mr. ALLISON. There is nothing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My honorable friend says there is nothing. Now I should like to know where the inconsistency comes in.

Mr. ALLISON. The honorable Senator from Vermont read a letter in which, if I understood the reading of the letter correctly, this engineer states that this breakwater at Cleveland is unnecessary and a wasteful expenditure of public money, perhaps not using those exact words. I simply stated that the same engineer had recommended the committee to insert that item, and therefore we had inserted it. If that be inconsistent, then I said he was inconsistent. If that be not inconsistent, then I did not say he is inconsistent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then my friend is not speaking of the east pier at all?

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only delay the Senate as an act of justice to this gentleman, because I think when I get his letter—it has gone to the reporter's room; it will be back in a minute—my friend will see he has done him an injustice, even about matters not connected with the east pier, which are only incidental in this letter; for I am bound to say of all the Engineer Corps, taking them at large, and this person in particular, whom I never saw but once in my life, they are men who endeavor to do their upright duty according to the light they have, without fear, favor, or affection. No politician, no statesman even, no anybody, as I believe, can swerve the gentlemen of that corps, speaking of them in general, and this gentleman in particular, one hair from the brave and upright performance of duty.

Mr. ALLISON. I trust the Senator will yield to me one moment, that I may state what I did say. The Senator stated that this late letter which the enginer wrote had been shown to the committee. In justice to the committee I said it had been so shown after the report of the committee had been made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I said that myself, when it was too late to do any good.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not so hear the Senator say. What I did say was that if this engineer had written to the committee, or through the proper Engineer Bureau, the committee might have had early knowledge of these troubles and difficulties at Cleveland. That is what I complain of. I do not know the engineer at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah, Mr. President, when we come back to the east pier we find that the Engineer Bureau never recommended anything for it at all.

Mr. ALLISON. I was not speaking of the east pier.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Therefore this engineer in that respect had no occasion to write to the Engineer Bureau at all. Some politician foisted this contrivance for the benefit of this railroad company into this bill somewhere. Of course by politician I mean a statesman, who had the large interests of national commerce at heart. That is what I mean by politician; I do not mean it offensively at all; quite the reverse; but it was very evident that the country could not live another year unless this east pier was taken care of. Between the city and the railroad, away up out of the necessities of the protection of commerce, there had been dredging and railroad occupation, &c., so that the city and the company had got into a little difficulty as to who should pay for it; and they harmonized their difficulty, as it is always very comfortable to do, by agreeing that the United States should pay for it, which would settle their disputes at once.

I come now to the point that my friend seems to rely upon as showing that this gentleman has recommended one thing and has then criticised it. Let us see if I can find that precise place, because I do not want to reread the whole letter. What this gentleman says as showing the way appropriations get into these river and harbor bills, the necessities of having an appropriation an issue and some member of Congress running upon it from some particular village, is:

> The idea of the very breakwater which has been commenced at Cleveland was, I believe, started as a help to election by a former member of Congress, and the changes rung upon it in the papers with that object. My own private opinion is that Cleveland could get along very well without it; and as a "harbor of refuge," "the game is not worth the candle."

That is what the Senator alludes to. Let us turn to what his command was from the chief office here: "You are commanded to reduce your estimates by two-thirds so as to leave only one-third." Congress had already commanded the erection of this Cleveland breakwater, which the ice in that lake every year kicks over and draws out the piles as a dentist will draw out a tooth; and it always will until we get a great cycle, when the democrats come in, for instance. Of course it will be so hot there then that there will not be any ice and the stumps will stay in just as they do in the Cape Fear River, or wherever it is, where we have an appropriation to pull out the stumps of the "late unpleasantness" that are still there. They will stay; but on this present occasion this man, acting under a law of Congress passed before, is called upon to estimate how much is necessary to go on and keep these teeth in the sand that the ice every winter pulls out; and he says so much. Then he is ordered by telegraph to reduce by two-thirds, and he does reduce so much. What justification has my friend from Iowa for saying that there is any inconsistency in his mechanically performing the duty of reducing the old estimate to keep these teeth in the sand, and his statement that as a harbor of refuge it is good for nothing, and as a work of public improvement that can be made to stay it will not operate, because everybody who goes there in the winter sees how it is that they cannot be kept in? I fail to see the slightest inconsistency between the two statements. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. CAMERON, and I am not sure but that he would regard this as a political question.

Several SENATORS. This is not a political question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not a political question, except so far as it affects States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will vote "yea."

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. THURMAN] and myself are paired on general topics, leaving it to my judgment where I thought we should differ. I really do not know how he would vote on this bill, and therefore I shall not vote. I should vote against the report, but I withhold my vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. WINDOM] is at present engaged in a conference committee and is unable to be here at this time. He would vote for the report.

Mr. MCDONALD. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MORTON] on political questions. I am not certain how he would vote on this question if he were here, and therefore, not being certain, I decline to vote.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am paired with myself on this question. There are some portions of the bill that I want to vote for very much. Some of the appropriations I think are necessary to preserve the public works, but I think some are very injudicious. Upon the whole I will vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON. The Little Narraganset was rather doubtful. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it in order to make a little speech? I should like to explain my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is only in order for friends of the bill; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island had a right to state his pair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Had he a right to state his reasons for going for the bill?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. GOLDTHWAITE.] Not considering this a political question, I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Key, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, West, and Withers—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Boutwell, Cockrell, Conkling, Dawes, Eaton, McCreery, Morrill, Wadleigh, Wallace, and Whyte—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hamlin, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Logan, McDonald, Morton, Robertson, Sharon, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Windom, and Wright—25.

So the report was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS and Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to enter a motion to reconsider the report.

Mr. ALLISON. I want that motion disposed of now.

Mr. SHERMAN. The motion to reconsider will give rise to debate and I prefer to go on. I call for the regular order. The Senator from Vermont can make his motion at any time to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report was concurred in.

Mr. HOWE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I called for the regular order before the Senator from Vermont made his motion, and stated that such a motion would give rise to debate.

Mr. HOWE. There is no debate about a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I have made my motion to reconsider I am entitled to the floor, and I have a little something to say upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I called for the regular order before either of these motions was made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio calls for the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand the Chair to decline to enter my motion to reconsider? I rose and addressed the Chair and was recognized, and entered my motion I think before the Senator from Ohio called for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask the Senator from Ohio if he rose and demanded the regular order before the Senator from Vermont moved to reconsider?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can say that I did. The Senator from Vermont, however, immediately rose afterward and made his motion. I called for the regular order purposely, because I inferred from the vote of the Senator from Vermont that he would move a reconsideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio stating that he rose before the Senator from Vermont, the Chair will then rule as this report was considered subject to the regular order that the Hamburgh resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose I say that the Senator from Ohio did not rise before I did?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would then submit it to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I supposed we stood on equal grounds here.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Vermont can make his motion afterward.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I propose to have it settled now whether I have made it or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to prevent the delay of public business by a political discussion, I now surrender my right to the floor, because I will not stand in the way if the Senator desires to make a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio surrenders the floor and the Senator from Vermont enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had entered it before; but I did not enter it for the purpose of filibustering against this bill at all. I was told while the yeas and nays were being taken—I am now speaking on the motion to reconsider, which is debatable—that the Senator from Iowa commented on the impropriety, as it appeared to him, of Colonel Blunt writing a private and unofficial letter to me as being a thing that an officer in the Engineer Corps ought not to do. Am I stating the Senator from Iowa correctly, for I was not in the Chamber at the moment when he is supposed to have made such a remark?

Mr. ALLISON. I said this: that if this engineer officer had made these communications to the committee, the committee would have had the information that the Senator from Vermont had and would have had the benefit of his views upon this subject; or if he had sent these communications through the regular channel, as I supposed Army officers were bound to do, the Committee on Appropriations would have had the benefit of his communications upon the subject before the report was made. I say now that I think it was exceedingly indiscreet for this officer to arraign members of Congress in a private, unofficial letter for seeking appropriations for personal ends and gains and to have that letter read here in the Senate as a means of showing that improper appropriations were in this bill; and perhaps I said in substance the same thing before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, so far as the first part of the observations of my honorable friend from Iowa is concerned, that if the engineer had informed the committee they would have had the information, I can tell him that they had the information as soon as I had; and, as I stated before, all this information about this east-pier business arose out of what took place in the Senate, and therefore there is no accusation which can justly be made against anybody in that respect. It was jumped into this bill somewhere or other in one House or the other, I do not know where, but I believe in this body in some way.

As to the second branch of my friend's observations, that it was very indiscreet in this gentleman—because I think it quite probable he is a gentleman still, if he has ventured to write an unofficial letter to me—to write a letter to me instead of writing to his superiors in the Engineer Bureau. That depends upon the question whether an Army officer, because he is employed in the Army, has lost all the characteristics and qualifications belonging to him as an American citizen. If my friend from Iowa supposes that to be the case, then it was very indiscreet, not to say very improper, that one citizen of the United States happening to be an Army officer should venture to write to another citizen of the United States on a topic upon which that other citizen had something to say without the authority of his superior. That is the question. I think, Mr. President, that is a question that answers itself. This gentleman has not written this letter to me in his capacity as an engineer at all. I stated and read most explicitly that the letter was a personal letter and unofficial.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me? He does not want to misrepresent what I meant to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. By no means, because I did not hear it.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not that he wrote a letter to the Senator from Vermont, but it is that he communicated to the Senator from Vermont statements with reference to this breakwater, which, if communicated to the committee in time, might have influenced them with reference to this appropriation. Now that letter goes upon the record here showing that the Committee on Appropriations recommended an appropriation of $50,000 which is of no practical utility. Therefore I say that this engineer officer did an indiscret thing in not saying publicly to his superior officers what he did privately and unofficially to the Senator from Vermont. That is the complaint I make.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the person was entitled to write me a letter at all, I suppose he was entitled to say something in it.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There would be no use in writing me a letter that did not say anything. It evidently would not do me any good, and it would not do the Senate any good, or my friend from Iowa any good, unless he has more potent powers than he has been suspected of, and those which he has are very considerable.

His point is that this gentleman ought to have communicated to his superior officers what he communicated to me, arising out of his seeing the debates and the facts that he perceived that I had been somewhat obnoxious—I will take a phrase that will suit the majority of the Senate—in opposing appropriations and schemes for appropriations that I did not believe to be justified by the public interest. My friend says that this gentleman ought to have communicated all that before to the Engineer Corps, to the headquarters. What had he to communicate? No such proposition existed as to this pier, and as to the other we all agree how it did arise. I stated before that Congress had by law made this thing inoperative, and he was called upon by the Chief of Engineers to report how much money it would take to do a particular mechanical thing. He reported it and all the other engineers did, making $14,000,000 in the whole all over the country. Then he gets a telegram from the Chief of Engineers of the War Department, "reduce your estimates for this work by a certain percentage." In obedience to orders he does exactly that thing, which leaves $50,000 for Cleveland.

Mr. ALLISON. That is not the request, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was it?

Mr. ALLISON. The request was to reduce the total of the appropriations within his district one-third.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I mean.

Mr. ALLISON. He might have omitted the Cleveland breakwater entirely, and it was his duty to omit the Cleveland breakwater if in his opinion it was a useless expenditure of money.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator begs the very question.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think so. He omitted other places and why should he not have omitted the Cleveland breakwater?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I cannot answer why he should or should not; but when he is commanded to reduce his estimates so much, and Congress having by definite legislation provided for Cleveland a certain contrivance of breakwaters and public works, he evidently did not feel authorized to fly in the face of the law, and accordingly he did it. Now the Senator criticises this gentleman because after this matter has at last engaged some slight examination and criticism, some little exposing of it to the light, and he sees the course of debate, he writes personally to another person as two citizens of the United States write to each other. He did not write to my distinguished friend from Iowa, I suppose, because he did not dare—I will not say dare, for he is an Army officer, but because he did not feel at liberty, for I do not want to say anything that can be in the least degree irritating, and my friend knows that I do not mean it; I only want to defend the honor and reputation of this man that I believe in entirely from what I hear of him rather than from what I know of him. He does not write to my friend from Iowa having the bill in charge though not the chairman of the committee, because he might feel that it would be an intrusion, but he ventures on an old and casual acquaintance to write to a gentleman he happens to know, believing that that gentleman would not be slow as an honorable man to communicate what information he had, official or unofficial, to the proper party and to the Senate at once.

Mr. ALLISON. But the Senator mistakes my point entirely. It is not that he wrote a letter to the Senator from Vermont; it is that he stated in that letter what he omitted to state before, and which if stated before might have prevented an expenditure of money. Now as I am up I want the Senator from Vermont to show me the law which directs a breakwater at Cleveland, Ohio. If there is such a law I have no knowledge of it. These appropriations are made from year to year in the discretion of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there was no law for it, that would make it a great deal worse, because my friend is as responsible as the engineer is, and a thousand times more. My friend makes the law and controls the law and repeals the law; this engineer does not, and if there is no law for making estimates for a pier at Cleveland, if there has been no previous provision of Congress, then my friend stands without any excuse in going in for $50,000 for this thing until he himself in some proper way has investigated the subject and knows it to be a proper object of public expenditure.

But, Mr. President, I did not mean to prolong this debate even this much. I heard, being called out for the moment, that something had been said that seemed to reflect upon the honorable and proper conduct of this gentleman, and knowing of him rather than knowing him in any broad sense, knowing of him as I do, I felt bound in doing justice as I wish it to be done to me, to vindicate as far as I could by a simple statement of how the thing occurred any reflection that might be made upon this gentleman.

Mr. HOWE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to ask a question of the Chair before we vote on that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CONKLING. That is one reason why I was not going to debate because debate is not in order. I believe it is still in order for a Senator to know what he votes on, and if necessary to ask a question of the Chair; therefore I respectfully submit this question——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair only did it to do his duty. He has been criticised before.

Mr. CONKLING. I am obliged to the Chair, but I did not intend to violate a well-known rule of the Senate. My inquiry of the Chair is this: A motion being entered to reconsider, and a motion made to lay that on the table, and that prevailing, does not the motion for reconsideration lie on the table subject to be taken up at any time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It lays the motion to reconsider on the table, and leaves the bill stand passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I do not agree to for one.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Chair makes that ruling, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair in order that I may say a word. It may not be very important upon this bill; it is of some importance in the usage and practice of the Senate. I humbly submit to the Chair and to the Senate that that cannot be the rule of this body. In the House of Representatives it is the rule by rule; and a customary motion is when a bill is passed to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and when the House so vote that puts an end to the whole controversy. That is by a rule in derogation of parliamentary law; but by the rules of this body everything upon the table of the Senate is pending, and everything pending may be considered by the Senate. Now a Senator moves to reconsider a bill. That arrests the bill. The Senate lays on the table the motion to reconsider. The Chair suggests that that carries the bill beyond the power of the Senate. Still the motion to reconsider is pending, but it is a mere empty ceremony. The ruling of the Chair takes away the substance of the whole thing; and when a Senator calls up the motion which has been laid on the table, to wit, the motion to reconsider, the bill has forever gone; and yet all the time the motion to reconsider is pending. I submit that is not the law.

The Chair may be able to lay his hand upon a bill passed for the relief of Asbury Dickins. That bill was passed, a motion to reconsider was entered, and that motion was laid on the table. When was it? It was the last day of the last session of the Congress, and everything fell with the expiration of that session. Of course the motion to reconsider was not pending; it lay on the table of the Senate and the Senate had died as to that session; without going into the question of whether it is a continuous body or not, a complete end had arrived of that Congress, and therefore everything fell.

Some Senators around me will remember a discussion, a very animated discussion, of this question in executive session two or three years ago where a motion was made to reconsider the vote confirming a nomination. A motion was made by a Senator from Iowa then, not now, to lay that motion on the table. A very heated discussion took place as to the effect of it, and it was held in that case that the motion to reconsider being laid on the table was exactly in the position to leave it a pending motion before the Senate, because at any moment it was in order to move to take up from the table that motion lying there. That I understand to be this very case. A Senator moves to reconsider this vote. I have already disclaimed any interest in this particular question; I feel none. If it were my motion to reconsider I should be entirely willing to withdraw it; but I want to preserve if I can uniformity in the action of the Senate, and at all events I should like as one member of the body to understand its rules. A Senator moves to reconsider this bill. That he has a right to do. That arrests the bill. Another Senator immediately moves to lay that motion on the table. That vote is taken. That under all the rules of the Senate leaves the motion pending before the Senate. No Senator will deny that.

Mr. WEST. Where does it leave the bill?

Mr. CONKLING. I am coming to that, if my friend will pardon me. If it be held that although the motion to reconsider is laid on the table, the only thing on which that motion can operate is to be immediately asported from the Senate, put entirely beyond its reach, as if the House had concurred, which of course it has not, in this report, (because we granted the conference and it comes here first,) this would be the last act on this bill and under the ruling of the Chair the bill would become a law at once, when it is carried to the President for his signature, which might be done in fifteen minutes, and yet all the time a motion to reconsider is pending. By the rules of the Senate any Senator has a right to move to take it up, and when he moves to take it up on the same day, within an hour, he is told by the Chair, "Yes, you have a right to move to take this up: it is your right to shear the wolf; but when you get it up there is nothing for it to operate upon;" the whole motion has been circumvented, an end has been put to the whole thing, the bill has gone forever; and yet the motion to reconsider is all the time pending. Can that be?

Mr. EDMUNDS. And lawfully pending, too, by the rules.

Mr. CONKLING. Not only lawfully pending, but it is twice lawfully pending. It is pending by parliamentary law applicable to this body and every other, and it is pending expressly by the rules and by the immemorial and daily practice of the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me a moment? I rise to a point of order. A motion was made to reconsider and a motion was made to lay that motion on the table, which is not debatable. My point of order is that the decision of the Chair is not debatable because the motion which was pending was not debatable. In other words, the effect of the rule which prevents debate on the motion to lay on the table cannot be avoided by starting another proposition and making it debatable.

Mr. SHERMAN. Pending that point of order I call for the regular order of business, the resolution pending at the adjournment yesterday, and which is subject to be called up.

Mr. SARGENT. Pending that, then, I move to lay it aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio withdrew his right.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdrew my right to the floor, but not to call for the regular order, the pending question. That is still pending.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to lay that aside.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator cannot do that until he gets the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. First I call for the regular order, and when that comes up I will appeal to the courtesy of the Senator from California that I may be allowed to proceed. Two hours have been wasted here in this debate now.

Mr. SARGENT. It is difficult for me to resist anything on the ground of courtesy, but it seems to me that this matter ought to be disposed of, as we are so near the end of the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Ohio states that in his surrender he did not surrender entirely the Chair will entertain his call.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was careful to surrender only my right to the floor. I have no right to surrender the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Ohio to say that he withdrew and abandoned; that was the term he used.

Mr. SHERMAN. I never have seen a member of this body treated in this way under the circumstances in which I am placed. Here a debate has gone on that does not involve a particle of the public business. The last point of it is whether or not an officer did right in writing a letter to a Senator. Under the circumstance I insist on the regular order, and then I shall appeal to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio states that he retained the right to call for the regular order, which he now calls for. The unfinished business is the regular order, being the resolution of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to print extra copies of the President's message in relation to the massacre at Hamburgh, South Carolina.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SARGENT. I yield, as the demand is made on my courtesy, the intention which I had of asking the Senate to lay this aside that we might finish the pending bill. I will take an early opportunity to call it up again.

Mr. WEST. Is not the pending bill finished?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No one wants to debate this matter any more. I only made the motion in order to do what I thought an act of justice.

Several SENATORS. Withdraw your motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not withdraw the motion for the reason that I voted on the wrong side. You can just take the vote in a second and refuse to reconsider, and the thing is done. I do not want to say another word.

Mr. SARGENT. Suppose we do that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not make the motion to delay the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the motion to lie on the table be withdrawn.

Mr. HOWE. I withdraw that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to. The motion to lay that on the table is withdrawn. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I made a remark a moment ago, and I did it because it seemed to me that there was a determined purpose here to waste the time on this important bill on a mere matter so insignificant that it can scarcely be deemed worthy of debate about the contents of a letter to a Senator from an officer of the Army. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the resolution of the Senator from Indiana.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the act (S. No. 866) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas H. Williams, of Maryland.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1516) to regulate the issue of artificial limbs to disabled soldiers, seamen, and others, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. M. RUSK of Wisconsin, Mr. A. V. RICE of Ohio, and Mr. J. C. BAGBY of Illinois, managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3168) relating to the partition of real estate in the District of Columbia, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM LAWRENCE of Ohio, Mr. SCOTT LORD of New York, and Mr. GEORGE F. HOAR of Massachusetts, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

THE HAMBURGH RIOT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submittted by Mr. MORTON on the 2d instant:

Resolved, That 10,000 copies of the President's message and accompanying documents in regard to the late massacre at Hamburgh, South Carolina, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, trying to be strictly accurate in regard to the facts I state to the Senate, I will pursue the argument I was interrupted in last night by the adjournment. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] seemed to doubt whether or not I had made a correct statement of the amount of the public debt paid during the eleven years referred to by the plank in the democratic platform. I have here now the official statement, and will simply read the result of the figures. On the 1st of July, 1865, the principal of the public debt, without counting the interest or money on hand, was $2,680,647,869.74. According to the official statement I have the of public debt on the 1st day of July this year, at the end of the eleven years, it amounts to $2,180,395,067.15. The difference between these sums is $500,252,802.59, and precisely the sum that I gave the Senate last night. But it must be remembered that the largest aggregate of the public debt was not reached until after the 1st of July, 1865. The public debt advanced in the next year to $2,773,236,173.69; so that the amount that has been paid by the republican party of the public debt, instead of being, as I said, $500,252,802.59, is, in fact, $592,841,106.54. This increase of the debt was caused by the payment of bounties and large expenses in disbanding the Army that occurred after the 1st of July, 1865. Thus the public debt continued to increase during the following year, and the amount I stated was actually less than the amount that has been paid of the public debt during these eleven years of administration.

Having corrected the misapprehension of the Senator from West Virginia——

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Senator prefer not to be interrupted?

Mr. SHERMAN. What do you want?

Mr. DAVIS. If it is objectionable to the Senator I will not interpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I have misquoted anything I will stop to correct it; but I have given the Senator the exact data. Here is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and here is the statement for July, 1876. If there is any inaccuracy in these papers, point it out. There is none.

When the Senate adjourned last night I had endeavored to show that the last clause of the democratic platform as to the resumption act was a concession to the soft-money men of that party; that it was opposed by Governor Tilden and his section; that he was against it; that it was a mere political after-thought, intended for the Indiana election; it was intended to have a double meaning, so declared by the very gentlemen who participated, and the leading men who framed that platform, by Mr. Dorsheimer and General Ewing, General Ewing pointing out the fact there at the inception of this controversy that this clause did have a double meaning, and that double meaning would be relied upon. Now, in Ohio, the repeal of the resumption clause is held to be a repeal of the resumption act, an inflation measure, while in New York and the Eastern States it is declared to be simply the removal of a hinderance to resumption. This diverse construction by the democratic party is entering at once into the canvass, and upon this, the only subject which the democratic party present in the platform in an affirmative way, they have a double meaning, purposely dividing, in order to mislead and deceive the people. It is precisely what was done by that same party in 1844 when they went "for Polk and Dallas, and the tariff of 1842," and the good yeomanry of Pennsylvania really believed that the tariff of 1842, which was popular in that State, would be promoted and continued and supported by the election of Polk and Dallas; but two years after the election, one of the earliest acts of the democratic party was to repeal the tariff of 1842 by the tariff of 1846. This double-headed construction was devised by these political managers for the same purposes of deception.

I said that Governor Tilden was opposed to it; and as an evidence of that I can point to the fact that every democratic Representative from the State of New York, except one, voted against the bill that was sent to us the other day. He was quoted against it. It was passed, a great many members being absent from their seats for some cause or other, by a meager majority on a small vote, the democratic Representatives from the States where the resumption of specie payments is popular avoiding the vote or voting against the proposition.

Now I come to consider the objection stated by Mr. Tilden in his letter of acceptance to fixing a time for resumption. I read this paragraph from Governor Tilden's letter:

> The proper time for resumption is the time when wise preparations shall have ripened into a perfect ability to accomplish the object with a certainty and ease that will inspire confidence and encourage the reviving of business. The earliest time in which such a result can be brought about is the best. Even when the preparations shall have been matured the exact date would have to be chosen with reference to the then existing state of trade and credit operations in our own country, the course of foreign commerce, and the condition of the exchanges with other nations. The specific measures and the actual date are matters of detail, having reference to everchanging conditions. They belong to the domain of practical administrative statesmanship.

What Governor Tilden says as to wise preparations is eminently true; but where has the democratic party in its action in this House of Representatives—and it now has the power of Congress practically in its hands—shown a disposition to adopt wise preparations? The resumption act was passed in January, 1875, and since that time the power of the House has passed into the hands of the democratic party. What wise preparations have they suggested, proposed, or adopted? None whatever. As I will show you, Governor Tilden points out what those preparations should be; but they have devised none. We, however, by the resumption act, did provide for wise preparation by a gradual reduction of the greenbacks, by a gradual retirement of bank-notes, by authority given the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds and accumulate coin, and by the authority given the Secretary of the Treasury to replace the fractional currency with silver coin, and thus to retire it from the field of redemption. Thus we have proposed and put into the law of the land all the necessary measures of preparation that are needed to carry out this act. And then, before the time comes for redemption, we have armed the Secretary of the Treasury with all the power over the public funds and the public credit. But what act has been passed by the democratic party or proposed by any member of it in the nature of a wise preparation? None whatever.

But that is not all. He objects to the time for redemption and says it is not well to fix a time for redemption. Why, sir, I have shown here to the Senate again and again that by the experience of all nations and States and communities who ever resumed specie payments after having had a suspension of them, a time has been fixed, and that time has been worked up to. The great example is that of Great Britain, where, after a suspension of eighteen years, they fixed a time, having to postpone it once or twice; but finally it was upon a law fixing the time for resumption that Great Britain resumed after her wars with Napoleon. That is not all; the United States Bank did the same. In the State of New York they did the same. In France, the most intelligent financial country, where their financial measures are studied with more care and more scientific research than in any country in the world, even in their recent trouble they fixed a time for resumption, and are now going through the process of resumption, the time having been fixed; and before the time fixed they will resume upon the specie standard. So again in the State of New York. Twice when the banks were suspended in that State, by the action of the Legislature, a time was fixed and they worked up to it. By the act of Governor Tilden himself a time was fixed in the State of New York to resume on the very day that the United States propose to resume. I have here an act passed by the Legislature of New York, approved by Governor Tilden, passed a few months after the passage of the resumption act of Congress, in which the State of New York came forward and conformed her action to the action of Congress. This law was passed, and is now on the statute-book of New York, while Governor Tilden has been governor. I will read it:

> An act to establish specie payments on all contracts or obligations payable in this State in dollars, and made after January 1, 1879. Passed March 22, 1875.
> The people of the State of New York, represented in Senate and assembly, do enact as follows: SECTION 1. All taxes levied and confirmed in this State on and after January 1, 1879, shall be collected in gold, United States gold certificates, or national-bank notes, which are redeemable in gold on demand.
> SEC. 2. Every contract or obligation made or implied and payable within this State, and made or implied after January 1, 1879, and payable in dollars but not in a specified kind of dollars, shall be payable in United States coin of the standard of weight and fineness established by the laws of the United States at the time the contract or obligation shall have been made or implied. (Laws of New York, ninety-eighth session, 1875, page 67.)

Here is an act of a Legislature of the State of New York fixing a time for resumption in New York, and the act was submitted to Governor Tilden and it received his approval; and now he calls this thing of fixing a time for resumption a sham promise, when I show you by the experience of all nations and all mankind, and of Governor Tilden among the rest, that a time for resumption has always been the first measure adopted and then wise preparations have been made to meet that time. And yet Governor Tilden has surrendered his convictions, the convictions of his life-time, his open declarations in favor of resumption, his approval of this very act, when he wrote the passage that I have read to you in his letter. It did require nearly forty days of incubation to get him to confess that he had been wrong all the time, and then he agreed to the repeal of this clause, not because it prevented resumption, as many of our people in the West think, but because fixing the day was a hinderance to resumption, it delayed resumption, it put off resumption, and he sits in that end of the saddle-bags and Governor Hendricks sitting on the other in favor of inflation or indefinite postponement of specie resumption, and thus these two candidates expect to ride into power.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he can point to any declaration or statement of Governor Hendricks, made at any time or in any place, in which he has advocated an inflation of the currency?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am standing on my feet here under a reasonable limit to speak; but I am perfectly astonished to hear such a question as that put to me. I am not prepared to quote Governor Hendricks's speeches, nor have I got his letters; but I know that he appeared in our canvass last year. I will tell my friend a fact that, I think, is better than a quotation. I know that Governor Hendricks appeared in our canvass last year when the democratic party was committed to the wildest ideas about inflation.

Mr. McDONALD. And so did I; but neither Governor Hendricks nor myself ever advocated inflation of the currency, and if the gentleman is not prepared to state that he has, I am prepared to state that he has not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know one thing: No one suspected any difference of opinion between Governor Hendricks and the democratic party of Ohio, while the Senator from Indiana, I will say to his credit, did say openly and above board that he was a hard-money man and did not approve of some of the positions taken by the democracy of Ohio. There was the difference.

Now let us go a little further. Not only has Governor Tilden surrendered his opinions, but he now gives us a plan for resumption; and I think he is the first democratic statesman that has gone so far as to put his hand to pen and paper and say what measures for resumption he is willing to advocate. Many of them, no doubt, are hard-money men like my friend from Delaware, who is honest and sincere, constant always in voting for measures to promote specie payment; but these democratic leaders have been very chary about putting pen to paper and advocating a specific measure for resumption. Governor Tilden has done so. I will examine the plan he proposes. He says:

> How shall the Government make these notes at all times as good as specie? It has to provide in reference to the mass which would be kept in use by the wants of business, a central reservoir of coin adequate to the adjustment of the temporary fluctuations of international balances, and as a guarantee against transient drains artificially created by panic or by speculation. It has also to provide for the payment in coin of such fractional currency as may be presented for redemption, and such inconsiderable portions of legal-tenders as individuals may from time to time desire to convert for special use, or in order to lay by in coin their little stores of money.

What does Governor Tilden mean by this? He means to hoard gold and silver. I am quite sure that in many States of this Union the proposition from a democratic candidate would be regarded as strange to hoard gold and silver, one of the devices of the decaying despots—I have not got the phrase strong enough—"effete despotisms of Europe;" this is one of the plans to cheat and rob the people, this hoarding of money. How often have we heard the changes rung on that phrase. Now he proposes to accumulate gold; but in this respect how does his proposition differ in the slightest degree from that of General Grant in his annual message? Have you not heard that proposition come to the Senate over and over again from republicans? President Grant stated it in his last message which I read last night in a more distinct way than Governor Tilden has presented it. He speaks out in plain Anglo-Saxon, and advises accumulation of coin for the purpose of bringing about redemption.

But Governor Tilden also tells us that we must have enough coin to redeem the fractional currency. He is behind the time. We have done it and have already provided by the resumption act itself for the payment of every dollar of the fractional currency that comes in, and not only that, we have devised a scheme by which this redemption is facilitated by authorizing the exchange of silver coin for United States notes. So that this part of his platform has already been accomplished by the republican party and the first part has been recommended by General Grant to the democratic House of Representatives and has been disregarded by them precisely as they will disregard and have disregarded this recommendation of Governor Tilden. Although this letter was written only a few days ago, yet already the democratic House have sent us a bill to repeal the resumption clause because they believe in that. Have they sent us any bill to accumulate coin? Why do they not respond to this plan of Governor Tilden? Why do they not give us measures of wise preparation, to use his language? Who expects them to do it? It is absurd.

The next clause in the letter is:

With respect to whatever surplus of legal-tenders the wants of business may fail to keep in use, and which, in order to save interest, will be returned for redemption, they can either be paid or they can be funded. Whether they continue as currency or be absorbed into the vast mass of securities held as investments, is merely a question of the rate of interest they draw.

Here he wants to pay or fund the greenbacks. "Do you want to pay off the money of the people that does not bear interest to take that away from them?" "Do you want to contract the currency?" How often have I heard the changes rung from democratic lips on these questions? Yet here is their candidate for President proposing to contract the currency, to pay off the greenbacks, and worse than that he proposes to fund them to pay interest on them. Sir, I have seen a computation of the amount of interest that would be paid on the greenbacks that you propose to fund. My colleague who is not present now at one time frightened himself, if nobody else, by computing the amount of interest that would have been paid upon the greenbacks if the funding act that I read last night of 1870 was passed. Now Governor Tilden comes in six years after we passed in the Senate a funding bill of this character and proposes to fund the public debt, as if it was a new panacea for all our ills and a wise preparation. I should like to have him go with this proposition, submitted by him, to the House of Representatives. They would be blind as bats to such a demand.

Further he says:

Even if they were to remain in their present form, and the Government were to agree to pay on them a rate of interest making them desirable as investments, they would cease to circulate, and take their place with Government, State, municipal, and other corporate and private bonds, of which thousands of millions exist among us.

Governor Tilden goes far beyond what I would go. He proposes not only to pay and fund a portion of the greenbacks, but to pay interest on the whole of them and thus absorb them, convert them into a capitalized fund, retire them in this way as was done with the compound-interest notes. Are you, Senators, are you, democrats, proposing to fund the whole mass of greenbacks? I have thought myself a pretty good specie-paying man, but I have always thought the greenbacks ought to be maintained as the basis of our national currency supported in a subsidiary way by the national-bank currency; but here Governor Tilden proposes to pay interest on the whole mass of the greenbacks, to capitalize them so as to sink them into the great mass of investments of the country. What then? How, then, is he to supply currency? I suppose by the national banks. But the democrats of Ohio resolved that they were going to be done with the national banks. Last year we were fighting the democrats on a proposition to put down the national banks and issue more greenbacks; and now Governor Tilden proposes to retire the greenbacks, pay them off, fund them, capitalize them, get them out of sight among the great investments of the country, and then I suppose to issue bank-notes. What strange inconsistencies we are called to meet in this political world!

The Government ought not to speculate on its own dishonor in order to save the interest of its broken promises, which it still compels private dealers to accept at a fictitious par. The highest national honor is not only right, but would prove profitable. * * * If, however, the improvidence and waste which have conducted us to a period of falling revenues oblige us to supplement the results of economies and retrenchments by some resort to loans, we should not hesitate.

Not only is Governor Tilden anxious to retire the greenbacks and fund them by allowing them to be converted into bonds and sink the balance of them out of sight in the form of an investment, but he proposes to do it by a resort to direct loans for that purpose. This is the plan proposed by Governor Tilden; and upon this plan, without one single act of any democratic agent or party-man in aid of the plan, he expects to carry the vote of the State of New York, where the feeling in favor of the resumption of specie payments is strong and almost unanimous. He proposes to satisfy the people of the West where there is a contrary feeling by quite another policy—by the other end of the saddle-bag—by yielding to the repeal of the resumption clause of the resumption act and by denouncing this clause as a sham. He hopes and expects that the South, governed by different ideas and by different animating impulses, will be united in his favor for a widely different reason than any mere financial policy. With the South it is a struggle for power and domination. But, sir, this coalition of a united South with such men as in the West may be deceived by this repeal of the resumption clause, and by Governor Hendricks's letter, and hard-money men in the State of New York, where they believe in it—this kind of a combination will be used to cheat and mislead the people and gain political power.

I said in my remarks last night that I intended to read every word contained in the democratic platform in regard to the financial question, and I think I have read all that is really material, but I will now read another plank of the platform with the commentary of Governor Tilden upon it. I read from the platform:

We demand a judicious system of preparation by public economies, by official retrenchments, and by wise finance, which shall enable the nation soon to assure the whole world of its perfect ability and its perfect readiness to meet any of its promises at the call of the creditor entitled to payment.

Governor Tilden in his letter says:

Public economies, official retrenchments, and wise finance are the means which the Saint Louis convention indicates as provision for reserves and redemptions. The best resource is a reduction of the expenses of the Government below its income, for that imposes no new charge on the people. If, however, the improvidence and waste which have conducted us to a period of falling revenues oblige us to supplement the results of economies and retrenchment by some resort to loans, we should not hesitate. The Government ought not to speculate on its own dishonor in order to save interest on its broken promises, which it still compels private dealers to accept at a fictitious par. The highest national honor is not only right, but would prove profitable. Of the public debt $985,000,000 bear interest at 6 per cent. in gold, and $712,000,000 at 5 per cent. in gold. The average interest is 5.58 per cent.

So far as this clause of the platform is concerned, it is one of those "glittering generalities" which mean nothing whatever, and I most cordially assent to it. It may be copied directly out of the messages of General Grant; but there is in it nothing that any man, with leave to make his own construction of the words chosen, will not readily assent to. In other words, he would say it is all correct. The commentary of Governor Tilden, however, is a good deal like the commentary of Sir Edward Coke on Littleton. Sometimes Littleton's law-French phrases were very confused and obscure, very brief and unimportant, while the commentary of Chief Justice Coke enlarged and expanded it into the light of the law. So with Governor Tilden's commentary upon this plank of the democratic platform. It says some things that I appeal to democrats to look at, and I especially want to call the attention of my friend from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] to one portion of this commentary. He talks about reducing expenses below income. The republican party, ever since it has been in power since the close of the war, has done that. Since General Grant has been in power every year, year by year our expenditures have fallen below our income. I have a statement of every year by months, a statement of the national debt showing that in every year from 1869, including the present, we have paid off more or less of the national debt. One year after the panic we had fallen as low as $4,730,000; last year the reduction was $13,390,000. This year we again have come up to the old standard of $29,249,000, nearly equal to the sinking fund. One year we paid $100,000,000 of the debt; another, $102,000,000. Every year the republican party, even in the hardest times, has saved money and applied it to the payment of the public debt. So it is not necessary to restore the democratic party to power again to bring about this favorable balance in our finances. It is done already, and has continued ever since General Grant has been President. During General Grant's eight years—Senators may not recall it—the amount of the public debt paid off is $426,023,915, and here is the table showing the dates and amounts:

There is another point that is significant in this commentary of Governor Tilden's, and that is he precludes all those democrats who believe in the old silver dollar from all consideration or opportunity to consider that question. He erroneously, it is true, says that your bonds are payable in gold, and repeats that phrase twice; and this commentary of his has been studied over and parsed from beginning to end, and it is significant of his construction of this whole silver question. I will again refer to that:

Of the public debt $985,000,000 bear interest at 6 per cent. in gold, and $712,000,000 at 5 per cent. in gold.

Those words are carefully chosen. Where is the law that makes this debt payable in gold?

Mr. BOGY. Is it not the same mistake that you made some time ago and other distinguished men made, that the debt of the United States was payable in gold?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. BOGY. I think I can show that my friend from Ohio himself was convinced at the beginning of the discussion on the silver question that the public debt of the United States was payable in gold. When the word "coin" was used it was supposed to be synonymous with gold. Governor Tilden, I think, is laboring under the same misapprehension.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is totally mistaken. I was the first man in either House to propose the restoration of the old silver dollar. As to the extent to which it should be made a legal tender on grounds of public policy, I stated my convictions strongly and introduced a bill in aid of my proposition; but for the use of silver in our road to redemption, I believe I can fairly claim to be the man who first proposed it in either House.

Mr. McDONALD. Will the Senator allow me——

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend is to come after me, and I think I must decline. When he comes to speak, I hope he will take the opportunity to express his view.

To show you that Governor Tilden in this carefully prepared letter has given a construction to the law which is not justified by its language, I have here the law before me. I find in the act of February 25, 1862, which is the act on which our public credit was founded, that these bonds shall "be paid in coin" and also the customs receipts are to be paid in coin, and so the interest on bonds and notes of the United States. So in the "act to strengthen the public credit," I find that gold and silver coin are both spoken of in the same connection. In the act for the refunding of the public debt it was supposed by many that we had provided for the payment of bonds in gold coin. It provides for the payment of them "in coin of the present standard value," that is of 1870, when gold and silver were both the established standards of value. And yet Governor Tilden, not idly, not carelessly—for he is not a man that does a thing of this kind carelessly, it was only after full reflection—has endeavored to preclude the whole question of the use of silver money in the road to and in the ultimate redemption of our United States notes.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question? What amount is the chairman of the Finance Committee willing to make silver a legal tender for?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to make it a legal tender to the amount of $20. I am also willing to make it receivable for all dues to the United States for internal revenue. Besides that, what I want to do, and the gate-way and the very road to specie resumption now before us, is to do with the United States notes what we have already done with the fractional currency, that is, to give to any holder of legal-tender notes the right to demand at the Treasury of the United States a silver dollar of the old standard. I would use that as a means of resumption and as the road to resumption, leaving, however, the question of the true market relations of gold and silver to be settled hereafter after the fullest consideration by a commission if you please, and then upon the final settlement of the question it may be necessary to make a new relation between silver and gold and bring them up to that standard. But in the mean time I have proposed, and I think my friend from New York agrees with me, that we ought to allow any holder of United States notes to receive the old silver dollar who desires to receive it; not that we would force him to take it, but give him the option to take it as fast as we can coin it.

Mr. BOGY. May I be allowed to ask a question here?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOGY. Are you in favor of exchanging the silver dollar for a greenback dollar, one being a legal tender and the other not being a legal tender?

Mr. SHERMAN. If anybody wants to surrender a United States note for an old silver dollar, I will give it to him with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. BOGY. And yet not make the silver dollar a legal tender?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would not make it a full legal tender for customs duties now payable in coin, and as such now pledged for the payment of interest of the debt, and this for reasons of public policy I have fully stated heretofore.

Mr. BOGY. Nobody would exchange one for the other under such a condition.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken. It was stated everywhere that people would not take your subsidiary silver coin because it was only worth seventy-five cents on the dollar while the fractional currency was equal to greenbacks; and yet we cannot get it out as fast as the people want that subsidiary coinage.

Now I hope my friends will let me go on. I do not want to be carried off into the silver question any further now, because I think that will probably be delegated to a commission to examine the matter fully. I again repeat my conviction that the true mode is gradually to retire United States notes by their voluntary conversion into silver dollars so far as any person desires to take them. This process must necessarily be very slow, because the mints of the United States cannot possibly coin all that is now authorized by law of subsidiary money before July 1, 1877. It would not be possible for the mints to coin more than the $50,000,000 now provided by law. Therefore no large amount of these dollars could be issued until after July, 1877. Next winter when this question comes up, the manner in which the old silver dollars can be made use of in order to promote resumption we can so act in my judgment as to secure a resumption of specie payments even before the day fixed by the resumption act.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator from Ohio tell me whether he will aid us in repealing the law of 1873, so that silver may become a legal-tender for all debts and all bonds?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think I ought to answer that question now. I think I could discuss it with my friend from Kentucky with great propriety; but as both Houses will probably agree to appoint a commission to examine the matter thoroughly, it ought to be left, and we all ought to leave it, to the consideration of the facts and principles that may be elucidated by that commission.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understand that the Senator from Ohio was one of the leaders who passed the act of 1873, by which silver, which had always been a legal-tender from 1793 to any amount, ceased to be a legal-tender; and as he is commenting on Mr. Tilden, I hope he will tell us whether he will lend us his influence in restoring silver as it was before the act of 1873.

Mr. SHERMAN. I, it is true, voted for, as the Senator from Kentucky voted for, the law of 1873, because as I remember aright there was not a division of the Senate, and the Committee on Finance considered that measure for nearly three years and dropped the silver dollar from among the silver coins because the silver dollar during all that time and for fifty years before had been worth more than a gold dollar and none of us were wise enough to foresee the change in the relation between silver and gold. I was no more responsible than he or any other member of this body or the other House.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not intend to charge the Senator with any responsibility, because I believe the act passed without any discussion; but the pertinency of my inquiry is now, as the distinction between gold and silver is shown and silver is becoming more abundant, will he help us to repeal that law?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will refer that to the commission for the present, but I now deem it due to frankness to state that my present impression is that on grounds of public policy it is not wise to make the silver dollar a legal tender for all debts public and private. I have stated that by my votes; but I am willing to leave that question open for discussion before the commission. Sir, you put that question to Governor Tilden, and Governor Tilden will tell you, "No, it would dishonor our country, dishonor our Government; these bonds are payable in gold." Do not question me, but question some of your political friends.

Mr. STEVENSON. I only questioned the gentleman because he was lecturing Governor Tilden for saying this debt was payable in gold when he will not tell us what his opinions are.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have said all that I believe is necessary to be said on that subject. I will now read another of these glittering generalities of the democratic platform.

Mr. STEVENSON. Perhaps my friend will tell us how Governor Hayes is on this question.

Mr. SHERMAN. When Governor Hayes writes about it I will tell you. This platform says:

> We believe such a system, well devised, and, above all, intrusted to competent hands for execution, creating at no time an artificial scarcity of currency and at no time alarming the public mind into a withdrawal of that vaster machinery of credit by which 95 per cent. of all business transactions are performed—a system open, public, and inspiring general confidence—would from the day of its adoption bring healing on its wings to all our harassed industries, set in motion the wheels of commerce, manufactures, and mechanic arts, restore employment to labor, and renew in all its natural sources the prosperity of the people.

That is very well-written English and I believe we could all vote for it; but would the democratic party as it is now organized vote for the measures that are recommended by Governor Tilden and upon which basis he rests this hopeful era of prosperity? I think I have myself in speeches more feebly made than his endeavored to depict a degree of prosperity that would undoubtedly arise from our going back to the old specie standard, but I could not convert all my republican friends to agree with me that the policy I recommended was wise, and I think Governor Tilden will have a good deal harder task with the democratic party. Sir, these glittering generalities mean nothing except to catch very ignorant people. The peculiar clause of this platform is:

> We believe such a system, well devised, and, above all, intrusted to competent hands for execution.

As the making of this platform is attributed to Governor Tilden, perhaps his response to that flattering comment might be read also in this connection. The plank says:

> We believe such a system, well devised, and, above all, intrusted to competent hands for execution, &c.

In his response to that he says: "That is me." Let us see.

> The Government of the United States, in my opinion, can advance to a resumption of specie payments on its legal-tender notes by gradual and safe processes tending to relieve the present business distress. If charged by the people with the administration of the Executive office, I should deem it a duty so to exercise the powers with which it has been or may be invested by Congress as best and soonest to conduct the country to that beneficent result.

The same declaration has been made by General Grant; the same declaration is made by Governor Hayes; and after all it is a question for the people to say who are the competent hands to carry on your great Government and to administer all these great affairs, and especially to secure peace, order, and equal rights to all citizens. Both these candidates are committed by their letters of acceptance to getting back to the specie standard; and we then come to the question, which party, which set of men can best be trusted to bring about this great result?

Mr. President, I will read another paragraph from Governor Tilden's letter to show how glaringly he is mistaken in the matter of figures:

> A financial policy which should secure the highest credit, wisely availed of, ought gradually to obtain a reduction of 1 per cent. in the interest on most of the loans. A saving of 1 per cent. on the average would be $17,000,000 a year in gold. That saving regularly invested at 4½ per cent would, in less than thirty-eight years, extinguish the principal. The whole $1,700,000,000 of funded debt might be paid by this saving alone, without cost to the people.

I entirely agree with Governor Tilden, except as to the general exaggerations contained in the statement. He is in favor of funding the debt into a bond bearing a lower rate of interest, and he shows that in saying that by saving 1 per cent. we may gain $17,000,000 a year in gold. If Governor Tilden had thought a moment he would have known that only a thousand millions of our bonded debt bear interest at 6 per cent. and that is the only kind we can fund now, and all we can hope is to reduce the interest on that one thousand millions of debt which bears interest at 6 per cent. What has he to say to his democratic House, who utterly refuse to consider a funding bill? The bill that I referred to last night that we sent them early in the session would have enabled the Secretary of the Treasury to have reduced a thousand millions of your bonded debt 1½ per cent. interest or $15,000,000 a year, and the Secretary of the Treasury gave us his official assurance that we could enter with success upon such a funding system; but the House of Representatives, a democratic House, utterly refused to make provision for the necessary legislation.

I agree that the public debt ought to be funded, and I ask you as sensible men to say to me whether the public debt is more likely to be funded under a democratic administration than under a republican administration? What is in the composition or elements, the threatenings, the dangers in the democratic party that could tend to give it a higher tone, a stronger claim upon the credit of the people of the world than the republican party? We know that there are elements in the democratic party which would make men cautious about loaning large sums of money on our Government securities, while the republican party has given you in its history a successful example of the process of funding almost without precedent. If it is intrusted again with power I have no doubt that Governor Hayes, with his orderly mind, with his sober, sensible character and qualities, will inspire that confidence which will enable us to fund our debt even on better terms than Governor Tilden proposes.

But that is not all. Governor Tilden says:

> That saving regularly invested at 4½ per cent. would in less than thirty-eight years extinguish the principal.

We have already reduced the interest on the public debt from $138,000,000, as it was when the Senator from Massachusetts was first Secretary of the Treasury, I believe. The Senator can tell me how much it was. We have doubled Governor Tilden's figures already by actual performance.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I thought I had the statement of the interest, but I have not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give it as I remember it. As I remember, the interest on the public debt when General Grant came into power was about $134,000,000.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think about that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now it is $100,000,000. So we have by our policy of paying part of the debt and reducing the rate of interest saved to the people of the United States already $34,000,000 in gold annually since General Grant came into power.

Mr. MORRILL. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that we paid in 1867 $143,000,000 of interest on the public debt, and the interest that we paid last year was $103,000,000, making $40,000,000 gain.

Mr. SHERMAN. I show you that it is my purpose to be entirely within the figures. As to the policy pursued by the republican party in funding the debt alluded to by Governor Tilden, we have already saved $34,000,000 a year, and now he promises, by a wise financial measure that the democratic House will not pass, to save you $17,000,000 a year. Well, sir, we will do better. I have no doubt that if the republican party is continued in power four years longer, with the high credit already attained by our Government securities, the whole mass of our debt, all that is available and fundable will be converted into 4 or 4½ per cents, saving from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 a year in gold. Who is most likely to do that, the republican party or the democratic party? There is the question. We have done it. They never have, and the very measures by which we have done it they have opposed and resisted to the bitter end. As I showed you, they opposed the funding act by the unanimous vote of every democrat in this body, and I suppose it was so in the House, though I have not examined the record of the vote in the House.

In another clause which I will not trouble you to read in full, Governor Tilden says that—

> The Federal taxes of the last eleven years reach the gigantic sum of $4,500,000,000.

I showed you last night, in reply to another statement, that that was totally erroneous. He has fallen down $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 below the democratic platform; but the whole amount, as I showed you, that was collected from all sources, was $4,192,633,000, and one hundred and sixty-odd millions of this was for the premium on gold sold, which was a source of revenue used to pay off the premium on bonds purchased. Deducting one sum from the other leaves about $4,000,000,000; and now Governor Tilden, on a simple fact that might be solved by reference to a public document, states the amount that was raised at $4,500,000,000, or a mistake of $500,000,000. My friend from Pennsylvania says that if he found a single error in a statement he condemned the whole statement. Apply that common maxim of the law to this, and how would you read the democratic platform and the commentary of Governor Tilden?

Mr. EATON. It is first necessary to show that there is any error.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did last night conclusively.

Mr. EATON. You think it to be so?

Mr. SHERMAN. I know it.

Mr. EATON. You are mistaken in your figures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly not. That is an improper interruption even if I should yield.

Mr. EATON. I think it entirely proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. The trouble in dealing with this question is that though the statements we quote here are the official statements of Mr. McCulloch, Mr. BOUTWELL, and General Bristow in official documents published to the world, and yet they deny them, or qualify them, or doubt them. I do believe my friend from Connecticut would honestly rather take a statement in a democratic platform indorsed by Governor Tilden, though proven to be erroneous, than all the law or testimony, human or divine, from the origin of the world to this hour. He believes in the infallibility of the democratic party.

Mr. EATON. I will not interrupt the honorable gentleman, but I will endeavor to answer a remark of that sort, which is unworthy of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do believe that the prejudices and party feelings of my friend—and I speak it with great kindness, for we all have more or less of them—lead him when he is dealing with sober facts like these to call in question public records and public statements. However, if he can prove what he says, all right.

Governor Tilden goes further. He speaks of the local taxation, and says:

> Local taxation has amounted to two-thirds as much more. The vast aggregate is not less than $7,500,000,000.

To a certain extent, with some allowance for exaggeration, this is true, and I showed you last night from the official statements what was done with all the revenues collected by the Government of the United States, every dollar. The great body of it was paid out for the interest on your debt, for the principal of the debt, for southern claims, for claims growing out of the war, and only from $1,400,000,000 to $1,600,000,000 of it paid for ordinary purposes of the Government in eleven years; and now when Governor Tilden arraigns the republican party for this enormous aggregate of taxation, I ask him who did it? Was it the men who were fighting at the head of our column in 1864 leading "the boys in blue" to victory, or was it Governor Tilden in the democratic convention in Chicago proposing to surrender, "peace on any terms?" Ah, Mr. President, the people of the United States will know who have saddled them with this enormous weight of taxation.

He alludes to local taxes. Millions and hundreds of millions of these have been caused by the war. The distinguished economist from the State of Connecticut, Mr. Wells, furnished us a statement in his last report, which I have not before me, showing that the debts of the loyal States were largely increased both in counties and municipalities by money raised for bounties and in various ways; and he estimated the amount of this debt created by the States and by corporations within the States to aid in the war at from two hundred to four hundred million dollars. We know that every county, every town, every city almost in all the Northern States did levy large taxes and did borrow money to pay bounties for soldiers during the war. Our taxes are heavy, and I believe I could appeal to the Senate to say whether I have not done all I could as one person to keep down expenditures and modify taxes. It has been my good fortune since I have occupied the position I have held here to aid in the repeal of taxes that yielded more than $300,000,000 a year. We have rapidly advanced in that direction, perhaps not rapidly enough, and I hail as an auspicious omen every reasonable effort for economy; but it should be that wise economy which consists in getting the greatest result from a given sum of money, not that economy which strikes at the hire of a clerk, which decapitates seven or eight hundred poor people in the Departments, which stops the public improvements in the name of economy; not that kind of economy which is done by sapping at the little fountain and cutting off little expenses here and there, but that broader economy which demands honest service for competent wages fairly paid.

Of all such economy I am in favor, and so has the republican party been. For years since the close of the war we have gradually reduced our expenses; perhaps at all times we have not gone far enough. I think myself we might have gone faster and farther; but we went as fast as those who were charged with the public service believed it was wise and expedient to go. And in this whole process of reduction and economy I believe it has never occurred when a democratic House has not been able to pile on our appropriation bills their full share of expenditures for the public service. Take the bill that was passed a few minutes ago, called a river and harbor bill. Is that a measure of extravagance on the part of the republican party? On the contrary, where are these creeks and rivulets, where are these mountain streams, where are these cat-fish pools and harbors? Large portions of them are in the Southern States. The bill is passed. Now to arraign the republican party for a want of due economy is not justice. You may by blind strokes greatly disturb the public service. I am told that even to this day no appropriations have been made for the payment of the judgments of the Court of Claims this year, and large sums will undoubtedly be necessary to make good deficiencies caused by this manner of dealing with the appropriation bills at the next session of Congress and after the election is over.

Mr. President, there is one other thing and only one other that I wish to notice, and that is Governor Tilden's promises about reform in the civil service. It is rather a curious spectacle for the people of the United States to find this enunciation from a gentleman trained in that school of politics from which the great rule of democratic orthodoxy came, and that is "To the victors belong the spoils," for if I remember it was a distinguished son of New York, Mr. Marcy, who first thrust that phrase into our politics. Governor Tilden no doubt will proudly tell you that he belongs to that school well known as the Van Buren school. Governor Tilden is an able and accomplished disciple of that same school and really boasts and prides himself upon the faithfulness with which he has adhered to it. I ask if it is wise for the people of the United States to depend upon Governor Tilden for bringing about great administrative reforms with the aid of a democratic Congress? The best answer is the experience we have had of civil-service reform in the democratic House.

General HURLBUT, a distinguished member of that body, thus describes the democratic practice of civil-service reform:

> How has this House applied civil-service reform in its own appointments? Has it retained competent officers or appointed new ones for the sole consideration of fitness? Sir, the advent of this democratic House to power was signalized by a pilgrimage such as has not been seen before. Lean, gaunt, famished by long abstinence the multitude of applicants passed belief. From Maryland to Texas came the hordes of office-hunters on the trail of their unhappy patrons, whose life they made miserable by brazen importunity. They trooped to the plunder as the vultures seek the carcass. You selected a Doorkeeper on the sole ground of his experience in the same capacity in the confederate congress, and you summarily turned him out because he honestly wrote to a private friend what you all felt but dared not say: that office was a good thing to have. It was hard on Fitzhugh, for he was not the only man on the floor that felt "biger than old Grant."
> You turned out clerk after clerk, gray and experienced in duty, and filled their places with partisans.
> You removed disabled Union soldiers and filled their places with others of another stripe, and would have made a clean sweep but for the popular indignation.
> You refused at first clerks to some of the committees, but have surreptitiously and in detail appointed more clerks than ever before known.
> You have twice exhausted the contingent fund of the House by needless and extravagant sums expended for witnesses on trivial matters, and have run up bills to be met hereafter of frightful amounts for making and printing your investigations.
> You have insulted the President by resolutions demanding his authority for the exercise of his official functions outside of the city of Washington, and have been ignominiously convicted of ignorance of law and of history by his crushing reply.
> You have demanded elaborate reports on all manner of subjects from the Departments and hindered the public service by exacting these replies on matters which had already been officially reported and were in print.

Such is the foretaste of the reform we have had in the House of Representatives. That is the only branch of our National Government that is now in possession of the democratic party. Where is Barclay, who survived during great numbers of administrations? Where are the soldiers of the Union Army, many of them wounded and disabled? Nearly all gone, a clean sweep; to use a phrase that I never heard before, although I am told it is common in some sections of the country, they are "bounced." Nine months of such experience is far more suggestive than an elegant letter on civil-service reform.

I have read to you, Mr. President, every part of the democratic platform which relates to currency or the public debt. I have presented you my views of such questions. I now say in conclusion that while these questions are important and instructive, that while we must take care that issues manufactured to deceive and to mislead the people are fully debated, while cunning devices to frame a platform with a double construction must be exposed, I am bound to say that the real question is whether the old democratic party will be able to bring together a united South with a fragment in the West and a fragment in the East and thus secure political power. It is not any hope or promise of reform that will secure success to this movement. On the question of civil-service reform, while you have the promise of Governor Tilden, you have also the promise of Governor Hayes, and he has added to that promise a self-abnegation of all idea of reelection. Governor Tilden promises to support a constitutional amendment that will prevent him from running; so upon this matter the two great and distinguished candidates are even.

Dismiss these things. I tell you, Senators, that the controversy into which we are about to enter will not turn upon the financial question. I have discussed it; I have discussed it here because I thought it was my duty to do it, and not very well prepared either, in reply to the ingenious commentary of Governor Tilden on the democratic platform. I have presented that platform. I have presented his commentary, and I have shown you that it is made up of empty promises, vain as air, bearing a double construction which will not be executed if the democratic party is brought back to power. But the real question of this campaign which every day has been rising and will still rise above the clouds until it is seen in the heavens by every citizen of the United States is whether the democratic party shall be restored to power again in this country of ours. That is the issue, not upon the financial question, not upon the question of civil-service reform, but whether from the elements and composition of that party it is safe again to trust power with the men who were driven from power in 1860, a portion of whom waged war against us, a portion of whom voted against us, and all of whom now when they are back again are resisting and opposing so far as they can all the great measures that we, the republican party, have placed upon your Constitution and your statute-books. These are the questions.

Sir, during this long struggle the democratic party has been simply a party of opposition. You have proposed nothing; you have opposed everything we have done, and therefore may be classed distinctly as a party of opposition. If, therefore, you are restored to power it is a reaction, it is a restoration; it is such a restoration as the people of England had when they restored Charles II to power after the commonwealth under Cromwell. And, sir, another rebellion in England occurred when after two reigns they drove the Stuarts from power. I say to you now that if the democratic party with its present composition shall come into power in this country, and if the evils that are inevitable should come upon us, the reaction would be instantaneous and decisive. The feeling of every man would be that a party that was untrue to the country, that for any reason whatever, whether it may have been as honorable and manly, as noble and brave a motive as ever actuated any people—that any party that during the struggle of a country in a civil war was false to the country and refused to stand by the national banner, refused to aid to the full extent of their power the Government in putting down a rebellion—that they and the men who fought against the country ought not to be restored to power in the Government. There will be a feeling of injustice, of wrong, of humiliation suffered by this reaction that will react again.

I say to my friends also that, while I do not intend to enter into the discussion of the scenes that have occurred in the Southern States, painful to the last degree, so that I never can read of them without horror, every occasion of that kind does create a feeling of strong and irresistible indignation in the minds of thousands of honest people. I would to God that many of the declarations made by Senators on this floor and Representatives in the other House could be carried out and that you who love law and order, who have respect for the rights of others, the poor as well as the rich, would prevent and punish these atrocities when they occur. If you do not, whether you are in power or out of power, these unpunished crimes, these bloody ghosts of men sent prematurely to their end, will haunt you every day of your lives. You are chargeable with them; your friends and your associates have done these things. Upon you rests the responsibility of putting down these atrocities. I know my friend from Kentucky would do it as readily as I would, but we have no power; we cannot spread the arm of the nation all over the Southern States. We must depend upon you to protect these blacks. The people of the North have been generous to the people of the South. Our history has not been marked like the history of other nations, by bloody reprisals, by executions after war was over, by confiscation, by wrong, and by outrage. No blood was shed after the war was over; no property was taken; all the offenses committed in the war were forgiven and forgotten. You were in due time, and very speedily, restored to political power. You have in your hands eleven or twelve of these Southern States. You are responsible for everything that occurs there. Every act of violence and murder is charged to your account, and you owe it to your manhood to put down these things. You must not teach the southern people that we hate you, or wrong you, or would do you injustice. So help me God I never have felt such a feeling, and I do not believe that is the feeling of the people of the State of Ohio. We would be glad to see you prosper. We share in your prosperity. Your development, your wealth, your growth all inure to our benefit as well as yours. God forbid that we should ever seek to oppress you in any way by unjust laws or the exercise of unjust power.

Go on and develop your country; cultivate your fields; build up your manufactures; improve your rivers and your harbors if you will, and we will aid you. Do all that you can to develop your country. What you do is for the benefit of us all. We are all of one country, under one flag and one Government. The worst thing that could happen to the people of the Southern States, in my judgment, would be the success of the democratic party in this election, because that success could only be brought about by a united South. In Louisiana and Alabama and Mississippi and South Carolina a majority of the people consists of negroes emancipated by republican policy and now in terror from innumerable murders committed in those States. If in the great convocation where the electoral vote is counted, we see the votes of States counted for the democratic party when we know that the natural instinct, the sense of duty, the sense of obligation, the natural feeling of the majority of the people, are with the republican party; if you bring the votes of those States by violence and fraud to your aid, it will be a short-lived power that you will exercise. We will not resort to arms; we will not make a revolution; we will not make a secession; but a public opinion will be aroused in all the free States that the Southern States must be just to those who have been freed by our policy or we will secure them justice. Otherwise the power of numbers in the North will be exercised against you again at the ballot-box. If you carry these States by fraud or force, watchful eyes will be over you; millions of free people will be watching you. If you give the negroes a fair vote, if you only use that influence which your superior wealth and superior intelligence give you over their minds, well and good, it is your right and duty; but if you violate the law, if you use intimidation, murder, or that nameless feeling of fear which may check an ignorant population from exercising their rights, you will gain no permanent results from it. That is my conviction.

I say again that for myself, although I claim to be a republican always, I never have felt and do not now entertain one single feeling of unkindness against the southern people. I know that the great body of them went into this war with honest motives; I feel that they were wrong. I know their success would have been to their injury. If they had succeeded in establishing a southern confederacy in the southern part of this country of ours, we should have been warring nations, hostile races, and ceaseless controversies would have been waged, as between England and Scotland, until both under one banner were reunited again. Gentlemen, it was well for you that this war ended as it did. It was well for your future that it was so. It was best for us all.

And, gentlemen, allow me plainly to tell you that though we are willing to do you absolute justice and share with you all political power, yet we do feel that we were the victors in this great war, and that our ideas, our principles, and our policy should prevail in the administration of the Government while the issues of the war are pending. The arbitrament of war settled these issues in our favor. These issues are written upon the Constitution and are the supreme law of the land. We do not think it safe to trust you with the administration of these great safeguards of liberty over men whom you have held for generations as slaves. We frankly say we cannot trust to the democratic party the power to guard and protect the rights that have been won by the war. I deeply regret that political parties in this country are not based upon other issues than the issues of the war. It would be far better for the South if one-half of the white vote was now voting the republican ticket and one-half of the black vote with the democratic ticket. But when the white men by their policy seek to combine all the Southern States into a compact political power and by force and fraud vote the negro against his wishes, they establish a conviction in the mind of every man who supported the northern cause that they are determined to revive and to continue the old contest and the old issues. It is for this reason this conviction is now deepening upon the northern mind; and it is this conviction that more than all else impresses me deeply with the absolute necessity to preserve the power of the republican party in order to continue and establish upon a safe basis the enduring guarantees won in the war.

Now, Mr. President, why can we not enter into this great contest with a manly spirit, each man presenting his own clear convictions, boldly and fearlessly trying to secure a fair election, and by the vote of a majority of the people of the United States in the form of the electoral college select a President of the United States? I believe that the safety of all, north and south, east and west, the good of our country, the record of history, demand the success of the republican party. I am glad to say that the standard-bearer of that great party is one of the citizens of my State, a man in the full vigor of life, a man unblemished in name, character, and reputation, with a strong manly intellect, one of those self-made men who receive nothing from the mere factitious circumstances of fortune or wealth, but has made his own way from the time he entered a school-boy till he became a member of Congress and a general of your Army, a brave soldier without one particle of feeling against the South, and full of kindness to his countrymen in all sections of our nation. I believe it is for the best interest of the people of the United States that this man, thus taken from the ranks of the people, unaffected by political combinations, unembarrassed by any pledge whatever, should be intrusted with the high power of President of the United States. Governor Tilden with all his promises, with the record of the democratic party behind him, and with the tendency and action of the democratic party to guide him, ought not to be trusted with power.

Mr. McDONALD obtained the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Indiana is kind enough to give way for a moment only that I may say a word in connection with what has been stated regarding the public debt. The Senator from Ohio this morning referred to the statement which I made yesterday evening about his being mistaken in the amount of the reduction of the public debt. I then sought in a polite way to ask the Senator whether I understood him correctly, and the Senator turned to me to know what I wanted. I will tell him what I want now, as he is through. In 1865–'66 the public debt, as reported by the Register and as remodeled by the then Secretary, in round numbers was $2,680,000,000. In 1875–'76, at the same date, it is $2,232,000,000, being a reduction of $448,000,000 instead of $500,000,000; and these figures are taken from the finance reports.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very happy that the Senator has made that statement, for now I think I can correct him. I took eleven years.

Mr. DAVIS. Allow me to go on and I will yield directly.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to go on and the Senator will have a little more to answer. If you take the debt statement in 1865, before it was remodeled in 1871, you will find that it differs about $2,000,000 in that year. In other words, there is a change of about $2,000,000 there, which would make no difference as to this statement. Then if you take the monthly statement which the Senator quoted from, we find it is $2,180,000,000, leaving out of question the interest. Including the interest it is $2,218,000,000. If you take the largest amount as reported in the report of 1865, and then take the smaller amount as reported in the debt statement, the Senator is correct; but I submit is it fair, is it right, or is it proper, in one instance to go to the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Register, and take the amount that he reports, and then when you come to 1875–'76 to go to the monthly debt statement? Of course, if you take the higher and the lower, the difference may be as great as the Senator says; but bear in mind that it is admitted on all hands that there are about four different statements for each year's indebtedness. In other words, if you take the monthly debt statement, if you take the Register's statement, or the Secretary's statement, they all differ. Now, then, if the reduction is to be looked at properly the same statement ought to have been adhered to; in other words, the Secretary's statement, or the Register's statement, but when the Senator comes to make his deduction of $500,000,000 for ten or eleven years he changes from one statement to the other, which, I submit, ought not to be done.

I want to say one word more and I will then leave the debt statement. The Senator spoke of the bill relative to 4½ per cent. bonds. He charged the House of Representatives with being accountable for not having the reduction made of interest from 6 or 5 to 4½, and says it was their fault that it has not been done. The Senator knew better than I can tell him that in 1870 there was an act passed giving the Treasury the right to change $300,000,000 from 6 to 4½, and that act is in force to-day, but not one dollar, as I understand, has ever been changed from 6 to 4½ per cent. Those bonds run fifteen years. The difference in the bill which we passed was that we gave a longer time; that is all.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I desire to say in reply is that my friend has only made a mistake in omitting one year. I said eleven years from the 1st day of July, 1865.

Mr. DAVIS. To when?

Mr. SHERMAN. To the 1st day of July, 1876.

Mr. DAVIS. That is just what I took.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; here are the papers. Here is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, a statement of the outstanding principal of the public debt of the United States, from the 1st of January, each year, &c. I gave the amount $2,680,647,000.

Mr. DAVIS. That is right.

Mr. SHERMAN. I took the statement of the principal of the public debt now, the total debt, $2,180,395,000, and deducted one from the other.

Mr. DAVIS. Will my friend allow me a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. Does he desire to make any correction?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; I am not denying the statement, but I beg the Senator's pardon, he has changed from the debt statement as reported by the Secretary or the Register, and he takes that from the finance reports; but when he comes to take his reduction he takes it not from that same report——

Mr. SHERMAN. But I take it from the monthly statement because this is a year later.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SHERMAN. The statement is as late as this year. This brings it down to the 1st of July. The book was printed six months ago.

Mr. DAVIS. And the year was out six months ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I brought it down to the 1st of July of this year.

Mr. DAVIS. Either the Senator or I, one of us, is mistaken in the statement. The book which he holds in his hands is for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. SHERMAN. This book was printed six months ago, and how could it be?

Mr. DAVIS. Why, Mr. President, the Senator knows that that 1875 means the fiscal year always, and that comes up to June 30.

Mr. SHERMAN. Eighteen hundred and seventy-five?

Mr. DAVIS. It means the fiscal year 1875, and comes up to June, 1876.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, it does not. The Senator is very much mistaken. The year that we are now going upon is 1876-'77. We have made appropriations now for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1877. That gives the name to the fiscal year the year 1877. The Senator will see that the statement in the book is only brought down to the 1st day of July, 1875. That is called the fiscal year 1875, but the fiscal year 1876 extends from the 1st of July, 1875, to the 30th of June, 1876. My friend is just wrong one year. That is all there is about it.

Mr. DAVIS. If that should be so, but I do not understand it—of course it cannot be so—then the Senator is greatly in error, because he admits and all admit that the reduction last year was less than $20,000,000. The Senator knows that. I stated if that be so the reduction in the present year was less than $20,000,000. Therefore the $50,000,000 that the Senator shows could not be correct.

Mr. SHERMAN. The reduction in the present year is $29,000,000.

Mr. EATON. I want to ask the Senator from Ohio what his figures are for the eleven years.

Mr. SHERMAN. I gave the statement containing those figures to the reporter. I will send the Senator a copy of the statement, but I cannot send him that copy, because it is in the hands of the reporter.

Mr. EATON. The Senator gave $4,192,000,000 as the net revenues of the Government for eleven years, I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; the gross revenues of all kinds; I will simply send the printed statement of that to the Senator.

Mr. EATON. Very well.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Madeline V. Dahlgren, Romaine de Overbeck, and Vinton Goddard, praying the passage of an enabling act authorizing the trustee of the estate of the late Samuel F. Vinton to sell or otherwise dispose of certain securities and other property belonging to that estate and re-invest the proceeds in other property, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their papers; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill (S. No. 1039) to repeal a portion of an act entitled "An act to confirm the action of the board of aldermen and common council of the city of Washington designating a depot site for the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company;" which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 310) granting a pension to William H. Harrison, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1539) to authorize the construction of a ponton-bridge across the Mississippi River from some feasible point in Buffalo County, in the State of Wisconsin, to some feasible point in Winona County, in the State of Minnesota, reported it without amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1040) to allow the late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Georgia his salary hitherto withheld; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

THE HAMBURGH RIOTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. MORTON to print extra copies of the President's message and accompanying documents relating to the riots at Hamburgh, South Carolina.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, the question pending before the Senate is the resolution of my colleague to print ten thousand copies of the President's message and accompanying documents relating to the Hamburgh affair. I propose, in the first place, to give a few reasons why I shall support the resolution. I shall support it for the reason stated by my colleague when he introduced it, that the people of this country may have some light upon the subject. It is true that these documents are ex parte in their character. They do not profess to draw their facts from more than one side of the question. There is no testimony contained in them except that which is brought from one party to that affair; but yet with all that they are much fairer, much less partisan in their character, much better calculated to give to the country a correct idea of the transactions than the comments which have been made on the Hamburgh matter in the partisan press of the country, or the comments which have been made on documents contained in this message by Senators upon this floor. It is because they do tend to furnish to some extent and in some degree light upon this transaction by which the people of this country can form some correct estimate of its character that I prefer these documents shall be published, rather than that such statements as have been made in regard to the affair shall go before the country. Among the accompanying documents the most reliable statement is that furnished by the attorney-general of South Carolina, not of what he saw, not of any fact that he knows of his own knowledge, but such facts as he gathered after the affair had occurred while visiting the scene and from the sources which he has here stated. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to his own statement of his sources of information:

> My information has been derived chiefly from Trial Justice Rivers and from the testimony of persons who have been examined before the coroner's jury now in session, and from those who received wounds from the armed body of white men who had taken them prisoners.

I do not feel that a Senator is called upon in discussing questions of this kind to start out with a denunciation of the outrage, and as for myself, if my life has not established the fact that I have always stood for law and order and opposed all unlawful violence from whatever quarter it might proceed, then a mere assertion of mine upon a question of this kind would be but an empty declaration. But let us see, if we can, what this transaction was and learn something of its origin and character. Let us take, in the first place, the statement of the attorney-general as to what he discovered at Hamburgh. I have already said that it was ex parte. I may say that it is clear upon its face that he is giving but one side of the case. It appears, however, from this statement that on the 4th of July some difficulty took place between two white men who were riding in the streets of Hamburgh and a negro militia company which was engaged in parading in the same street. But little is said in reference to that difficulty in this report or in any of the documents accompanying it; but this much is established, that whatever that difficulty might have been, it was of such a character that an affidavit for a breach of the peace against the officers of that company or some portion of them was made the next day, and the trial justice, Rivers, who also seems to have been the military commander of that district under Governor Chamberlain, issued his warrant upon that affidavit. The captain of the company was arrested upon that warrant and brought before the justice, and it seems from the statement of the attorney-general the first act of this defendant in that proceeding was to commit a contempt of court, which rendered his arrest or attempted arrest for that contempt necessary in the opinion of the justice, who was one of his own color and his friend. Here is what the attorney-general states upon that point:

> During the progress of the trial Adams was arrested by the trial justice for contempt of court, and subsequently the case was continued until four o'clock Saturday afternoon, July 8.

This took place on the return of the warrant. The conduct of this negro captain was such as required his arrest for a contempt of court, and when the case was continued he left the office of the justice and never made his appearance there again in connection with this transaction. It passed over until the 8th of July. What transpired in the mean time does not appear from these papers. What crimination or recrimination, if any, passed with respect to these parties does not appear; but it does appear that on the 8th of July the parties who had sued this warrant, with their attorney, came before the justice of the peace, but the defendant did not come; on the contrary, he left both the prosecution for a breach of the peace and the arrest for contempt unanswered.

The difficulties seem not to have slumbered during that time. Although the facts are not stated, the circumstances that transpired indicate most clearly that there were facts and that matters were progressing toward a collision between the white and colored people of that section of the country. It appears that on the 8th, in place of presenting himself before this justice who had issued an order for his arrest for contempt, and before whom he was required to appear upon the warrant that had regularly issued, this captain placed himself at the head of his company and under arms. A demand seems to have been made by the white citizens who had assembled that the company should surrender their arms. There is an attempt in this report to a certain extent to involve the counsel for the prosecution in what occurred; but he has furnished to the public his own statement of this transaction. I would not perhaps feel authorized to refer to it if it had not been for the fact that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PATTERSON] has testified in the strongest possible terms that he is a man of unexceptionable character, of the very highest character, and he has expressed the great gratification that would accrue to him if in the final investigation of this unfortunate tragedy it should be found that Mr. Butler is entirely innocent. His support of Butler's character as a man authorizes me to refer to the statement that Butler has made, in which he shows that in the violence that transpired there he took no part, and that so far as he did act he attempted to act as a mediator for peace. It has been said on this floor, and I shall call the attention of the Senate more directly to the statement hereafter, that this military company had surrendered their arms. There is not one word in any of the papers connected with this report that authorizes that statement. They refused to surrender their arms. Eventually they retired to their armory, a brick building, and there they remained until the difficulty had become a war between them and those who were demanding a surrender of their arms.

That part of the transaction I desire to give from the statement of the attorney-general in his own language. He says:

While these negotiations were going on, the armed body of white men in the town were concentrated on the bank of the river near the Sibley building. Soon after they were broken off firing began.

Men who were in the building say that it was commenced by the whites firing upon the building.

Would it not be well enough to know what the men on the outside of the building said upon that subject? This report states that the men in the building said the firing was commenced by the white people outside; but no statement is taken or embodied is this report of what the men outside said upon that point. This same Mr. Butler, whose character has been so highly sustained by the Senator from his own State, [Mr. PATTERSON,] has spoken upon that subject and his statement is contained among the documents that have been submitted to us and for publication of which this resolution is pending. On that question he says:

The negroes were fortified in their drill-room, in a brick building known as Sibley's corner, and they raised a yell and fired from the windows, which was responded to by the whites, and a general firing took place.

That is the statement of one of the parties from the outside. That is a statement that has not been made at any time in the presentation of this case to the Senate and to the country during this discussion. There is one point upon which both the attorney-general in his report and Mr. Butler agree, a point also that has been studiously kept out of the discussion, that is, as to who were the first sufferers in this unfortunate affair. The attorney-general says:

After the firing had begun, it was returned by the militia, and one of the attacking party, McKee Merriwether, was shot through the head and instantly killed.

On that point Mr. Butler says:

Not a very great while after the firing began, Mr. McKee Merriwether, a most estimable young man, was shot through the head and killed. Not a negro had then been touched—and Merriwether's death naturally infuriated the already excited crowd, and they were under the leadership of no one.

And then he says, what you might naturally suppose would occur—

Then this company of negro militia exhausted their ammunition. It is stated in the report of the attorney-general that the company had brought little ammunition, and all they had was a portion of that issued to the company when it was organized. After they had exhausted their ammunition then they sought safety by flight. They had not surrendered their arms; they never surrendered their persons or their arms.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like to ask the Senator if he has read the evidence? The evidence is that when the negroes fled to the building the parties outside brought a cannon to bear upon it, and had commenced firing on the building with the cannon. That is when they fled. That is the evidence.

Mr. McDONALD. The affidavit of the captain of the company is among these documents, and he states that he constructed a mode of escape for them from the back part of the building. I am giving this narrative, this ex parte narrative we are called upon to publish to the country, and I am giving also what I understand even this ex parte testimony to present in regard to this case. I state again that there was no surrender on the part of that negro company. When they fled from the building they secreted themselves and were hunted and captured one by one, not upon any surrender. I do not say that that authorized, justified, or excused this infuriated mob shooting down the colored men they had thus captured; but it has been constantly presented to the Senate and to the country by those who have undertaken to discuss this question that the negroes had given up their arms peaceably, that they had surrendered their arms into the hands of white men and surrendered their persons, and that then, without any outrage having been committed by them, without any act being done that could justify heated blood much less such an atrocity as followed upon it, they were taken out and shot down in cold blood. But the attorney-general states no such case at that.

After the firing had begun, it was returned by the militia, and one of the attacking party, McKee Merriwether, was shot through the head and instantly killed. After this a piece of artillery, said to belong to the Washington Artillery, of Augusta, was brought over from Augusta and four charges of canister were fired from it upon the armory, but without injuring any one. The persons in the armory escaped from the rear by means of ladders, and hid under floors of adjacent buildings or wherever else they could find shelter.

He goes on then to state that some twenty-five colored men were captured by white men who made search for them, and of the number captured six were killed and three were wounded. To show you how much fairer that statement is than the statements that have been made with reference to this transaction by those who have attempted to present it to the Senate and to the country, I ask the Secretary to read from the speech of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] the passages which I have marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The poor, misguided, uneducated colored militia company supposed that they had some rights as a military company to occupy the street as well, and they did not let them drive through, whereupon the next day——

Mr. PATTERSON. They did drive through. The company opened ranks and let them go through for the sake of peace.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But having been delayed until their cigars went out, or until they got dry again, or whatever it might have been, they then complained of the captain or some officer of this military company before a justice of the peace for some kind of an assault or some nuisance that interrupted the public highway when their lordships wished to drive along; and a warrant was got out for the arrest of this colored captain, or whatever officer he was. The colored people in that region may have had some suspicions from what they had noticed before about arrests of their race that if their captain was arrested on a warrant from this justice, the moment he was taken into custody the next moment he would die. That was the way justice was frequently administered; and they naturally had a little reluctance to seeing their captain disposed of with such summary justice as that, to be shot the moment he laid down his gun and handed him over to the sheriff so that it would be safe to shoot him when he could not shoot back. They were a little reluctant that he should surrender himself on the warrant of the magistrate. What did they do? Did they threaten to kill anybody? No; but they did assemble the company again under arms in the street and near their armory; and in that company this man took shelter. Is there any evidence at all that the sheriff was resisted? No! He did not go into the ranks to try to get the man. Not a bayonet was poised or a musket loaded, so far as we know. Then appeared the other Butler on the scene; and hastening over into the convenient and friendly State of Georgia, which was the nearest at hand, he told some of the young men that there was trouble brewing, for a considerable number of whites also had begun to assemble over in Hamburgh, and that the young men had better go over and see what was going on. That is the mildest way of putting it. So they did go over; and a large organized mob, under the command of somebody, assembled there.

Mr. PATTERSON. Taking a cannon with them, too.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And taking a cannon with them. Then this negro company retreated, without firing a shot, without injuring the property or liberty of any human being, into their armory which for the purposes of that case and at that time was their castle as much as your house or mine is ours; and this mob trained their guns upon them and threatened to destroy the whole lot if they did not surrender. Then there was turbulence, a little violence, and some shooting, I believe. Finally the colored company on a parley engaged to lay down their arms, which they had only raised in self-defense, and surrender them if they could be protected. They did lay down their arms and surrendered—laid down their arms to a body of men who had no more right to demand it than it has that you shall leave that chair at this moment and threaten to shoot you if you do not. And as they emerged one by one from that place of refuge of their own to which they had resorted, they were shot down by this organized body of the white respectable and responsible citizens of the States of South Carolina and Georgia.

Mr. McDONALD. Now, Mr. President, I do not think that any person could listen to the two statements, the statement of the attorney-general of South Carolina giving a narrative of this transaction, and the statement of the Senator from Vermont in undertaking to characterize that transaction, and suppose that they referred to the same thing at all. It is stated by the Senator that there was some little trouble after they had retired to the armory; that a parley took place between them and the force outside; that upon that parley they surrendered their arms, and after they had thus surrendered their arms and were taken prisoners then this shooting took place. The circumstances that caused that mob to become infuriated, the killing of the man Merriwether before any other person was hurt, is kept studiously out of sight.

But there are other points to which I wish to refer very briefly. These transactions are to be sent out to the country for their consideration. It seems to me that when commenting upon ex parte testimony a greater degree of care and caution not to exaggerate should be observed than where the testimony is presented on both sides. But the partisan purpose of the comments we have listened to is plain enough to any one. It is to continue to incite and agitate the sectional prejudices of one section of the country against another by firing the northern heart, as it is sometimes termed, against the people of the South for the purpose of controlling the election and keeping the present party in power.

The governor of South Carolina has sent his view on this question with the documents which he transmitted to the President, and it is in that statement alone that you can find any trace of a political affair in this Hamburgh matter; and this is to be found in the innuendoes of the governor of South Carolina, not in any statement of facts, because he was not present. He does not pretend to give any fact within his knowledge, but he has stated some facts that to a certain extent contradict his assumption that there was any political purpose in this difficulty. He says:

I do not intend to overstate any matters connected with this affair, nor to omit any statement which seems to me essential to a full understanding of its significance. It is certainly true that most, though not all, of those who have spoken through the newspapers or otherwise here, on the white or democratic side, upon this matter, have condemned the massacre. Their opposition to such conduct has not, however, sufficed to prevent this massacre, nor do I see any greater reason for believing that it will do so in the future.

Their opposition, he says, has not prevented it. He gives them the credit of having denounced it. It would be very hard for them to prevent it, not being present to exercise their influence over those who had become a mere mob under the circumstances of that affair. It would be very difficult for those white democrats of South Carolina who have denounced it to have prevented this difficulty. I might say also that under the circumstances they were no more to be blamed than the governor of that State. They had less power than he had to prevent a difficulty of that kind if he had exercised the official power he possessed. It may be possible that Governor Chamberlain stands with respect to white people and tax-payers over whom he has been placed as governor very much in the attitude that the late governor of Mississippi occupied to the people of that State. He had been placed over them as military governor in 1869, he had been elected to the United States Senate, he had been elected governor of the State in 1871, re-elected again in 1873, and yet in the summer of 1875, when the agent and emissary of the Department of Justice went to that State for the purpose of looking into the question and determining whether any armed interference on the part of the Federal Government was necessary, this agent stated in his testimony taken by the Senate committee that when he arrived there he learned the fact very much to his surprise that Governor Ames had not the acquaintance of the most influential citizens of the State of Mississippi residing in the capital of the State where he himself resided. The first act of this agent, who seems to have been a man of some common discretion and common sense, was to make Governor Ames acquainted with the leading men of the State of Mississippi, over whom he had been exercising his rule for so many years. It may be that Governor Chamberlain was in the same condition and that he would require an introduction to these leading men in order to impress upon them his views in regard to this matter, if he had any.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. McDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I can inform the Senator that Governor Chamberlain stands to-day in South Carolina as popular in the democratic party as in his own party; and the democrats are agitating the question to-day whether they shall not adopt Governor Chamberlain as their candidate for governor next Tuesday. That never was the case with Governor Ames.

Mr. McDONALD. I am very glad to hear that. I am certain if that course should be adopted disturbances such as occurred at Hamburgh will cease.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator will allow me to say that it seems to me if the old residents of Jackson, the natives of the South, had exercised the proper etiquette in calling upon the executive of the State they would have been acquainted with him.

Mr. McDONALD. If Governor Ames had gone to Mississippi simply to settle there as men emigrate from one part of this country to another, it would undoubtedly have been the polite thing, according to the rules of etiquette, for those in whose midst he settled to call and make his acquaintance; but Governor Ames went there in the first place as a military governor. He afterward sought and obtained the position of United States Senator. He was afterward a candidate for governor, elected and re-elected; and so holding that office, pretending to be the governor of these people, I apprehend that it devolved upon him, if he entertained a just sense of his responsibility and his position, to make himself acquainted with the people over whom he was attempting to exercise the powers of a ruler, and especially when it was an admitted fact that they owned four-fifths of all the property in the State and consequently contributed four-fifths of all money that went into his pocket on account of the services he was supposed to have rendered them.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me a moment?

Mr. McDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not quite understand the position which the honorable Senator takes in regard to the matter of etiquette. I understand him to say that Governor Ames was first military governor, then United States Senator——

Mr. McDONALD. I shall not give way for a speech.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Oh, I am not going to make a speech.

Mr. McDONALD. For any question I am ready to give way or if I make a mistake I am ready to be corrected; but I cannot permit a Senator to put a speech into mine under the plea of asking a question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I want to know if, on the ground the Senator takes, Governor Ames should have called on the people of Jackson. I am interested in the question of etiquette.

Mr. McDONALD. I have attempted to state the grounds; he did not go there for the purpose of casting his fortunes with the people of that State, but that he thrust himself upon them as their ruler.

Mr. McMILLAN. Therefore he was regarded as a carpet-bagger, and nobody would associate with him.

Mr. McDONALD. Through the aid of the negro votes and a few political adventurers, who did not represent the property or the people under his control, he kept himself there; and yet when this agent went down for the purpose of looking into the affairs of that State he thought that it would be a proper thing to bring this governor into some kind of acquaintanceship with the men of property whose life and whose destiny he undertook to control. Nor did he meet with any difficulty in so doing from those people.

The Senator from South Carolina says that Governor Chamberlain is acquainted with these people. I am satisfied that the more thoroughly he extends his acquaintance in that direction the better understanding there will be between the different elements in that State. The objection that I have had to this discussion and to the misuse that is made of these difficulties, these race collisions, arises from the very fact that men seek mere political advantage, mere political success by the use of these means rather than in endeavoring to understand their secret springs and to bring about some kind of remedy. As one very significant fact these race collisions were begun very soon after the reconstruction policy of the republican party was put in force in the Southern States, and they have grown less and less year by year, and have ceased in those States where the democratic party has come into power, and they exist now only in those States that are under radical rule.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PATTERSON. How about the massacre of negroes in Tennessee two years ago, under Governor Brown? That was a democratic State at that time.

Mr. McDONALD. That affair was investigated at the time, and late developments show that it was a great fraud, as the Senator may learn by reading the public press.

Mr. PATTERSON. The perpetrators were never punished.

Mr. McDONALD. It only seems necessary, in order to bring about amicable relations politically between the two races in the South, that radical rule should be shaken off. I know the republican party are loath to give up the great fund of political capital that they held in their hands when the negro of this country became a voter. They supposed that he would always remain plastic in their hands, and by that means they would secure an ascendency in at least half of the Southern States. In the very beginning a system was organized which was intended to hold that race up to the party lines of the party that claimed their votes. A great deal has been said about the terrorism of the South growing out of these race collisions, but there has been a terrorism that has not yet been spoken of, and it is that which has been exercised over the negro voters in Southern States by their own race through the instigation of the white men who are profiting by their aid. I say now, and I say it in the light of facts, that the bravest man in the South to-day is the negro man who has the courage to vote the democratic ticket.

As proof of that proposition and to show the means resorted to for the purpose of affecting their votes and keeping them under political subjection I ask the Secretary to read the card of a prominent colored minister of the South showing his trials and difficulties. First state the paper that contains it.

The CHIEF CLERK. This paper is the Daily Dispatch, published in Richmond, Virginia, under date of August 9, 1876:

A CARD FROM A PROMINENT COLORED TILDENITE.

The cause of Tilden and Hendricks among our colored friends is on the increase. Many of the most intelligent among them are falling in ranks. We append the following from Rev. J. W. Dungee:

To the editors of the Dispatch:

I feel compelled, in justice to myself, the good of my race, and the best welfare of the community in which I live, to say a few things which I think ought to be said.

A card appeared in the Evening State a few days ago stating that myself, Mr. Derrick, and Holmes were at work for the great reform movement. Mr. Derrick, and Holmes of the First Baptist Church, (colored,) published in the Enquirer of this city a card declaring their allegiance to the radical party, at the same time saying they are for peace and prosperity. Now, these two declarations are in conflict with each other. You cannot serve God and the devil at the same time. I warn these gentlemen now of the fearful calamity which their present course will entail upon the colored people of the South.

For years we have seen our people marched to the polls and compelled to vote for any man brought out by the radical party, without regard to his moral character or fitness for the office. This has been practiced all over the South. The men thus voted for or put in office have plundered the southern people in the most shameful manner. Every State where they have had the opportunity has been sunk beneath a burden of debt. Behold the cunning duplicity which they practiced upon our people in the Freedmen's Bank fraud, as well as in many other instances. In Washington, right under the eye of the Government, they had a board of public works which plundered the district government in the most wretched manner. The report of Hon. B. B. DOUGLAS, of Virginia, and Hon. W. S. STENGER, of Pennsylvania, expose the most startling frauds practiced upon us at a time when we were helpless and confiding in their friendship. It turns out to have been a scheme concocted for the very purpose of robbing our poor people. They have robbed every State government in the South where they have had the chance. They have labored steadily to keep us arrayed against the white people of our section who are our best friends. They have only used us as political tools. True, they have kept a few colored men in office, but it has been to do their dirty work. The position of Messrs. Derrick and Holmes make them a party to these frauds, and the only way they can clear themselves from it is to come out from bad associates. But I fear they are carrying two faces, and, if so, the community ought to be informed of it. On last Sunday all the leading colored pulpits were used for a medium of advertisement for the radical party, and Rev. James H. Holmes took occasion to warn his people not to have anything to do with me. At Rev. R. Wells's church they indorsed Mr. Derrick as a good radical. I also hear from good authority that Rev. Mr. Derrick belongs to one of the Hayes and Wheeler clubs of this city.

If they are "for peace and prosperity," why have these gentlemen within the last six months used every means to persecute and drive out of town the pastor of the Navy Hill church, because he chooses to differ with them in politics? Why do they use their churches for such unholy purposes, and then pretend that they have nothing to do with politics?

It gives me great pain to speak of the outrages practiced against me and my church of late. The whole neighborhood of my church has been canvassed and the people warned not to attend my church. They have also compelled the children to leave my Sabbath school. Some of these children have been to my house and wept bitterly because they were made to leave. They have threatened to burn my house and church; they have left no stone unturned to drive me out of the city. I heard one minister say that he would compel me to leave by all means he could resort to. Now, all these are facts. Does this look like peace and prosperity? No, no; it is just the work which they are bid to do by the radical party. I say to these gentlemen and to the colored people at large, that these are things which they cannot overlook. The first thing for us to do is to make full and manly reconciliation with the whites among whom we live. I was born in the South, and served twenty-seven years of my life a slave, and I have traveled over nearly every part of the North, and I know that the colored people of the South are better off than anywhere in the North; and I would advise our people to be frugal and upright; educate your children, give them good trades, buy homes, get property, and stand with our own people; drive all carpet-baggers out of the South by letting them alone, and then we will have peace. Bury the dead past, go in for honesty and reform, and we will have peace and prosperity indeed.

J. W. DUNGEE.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator allow me one word again?

Mr. McDONALD. I will yield for a question, but not for a statement.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is merely a question, because I know the Senator did not interrupt me; and if he had I should have yielded cheerfully. That statement which has been read is the statement of a colored man, I understand?

Mr McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PATTERSON. Do you believe it?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask the Senator if he believes the sworn statement of these colored men taken before this coroner's inquest?

Mr. McDONALD. I have already said what I intended to say of the documents contained in the President's message. I simply have this further remark to make in regard to that transaction, that upon the face of those documents it is clear that it was simply a race collision, in which there was not mingled in any form any political element. It was such a collision as perhaps springs from the distrust that exists there between the white and the colored people, kept alive to a very great extent by those who have been using the colored people of the South as political machines. That will account for the fact that as the power of that party passes away in any southern State these race collisions begin at once to cease. In the State of Virginia, in the State of North Carolina, in West Virginia, in all the States of the South except in the States of South Carolina and Louisiana, they have ceased; for even in Mississippi there has been no race collision of this character since the political power in that State went into the hands of the democratic party.

In the course of this discussion the status of the States lately in rebellion has been to some extent considered. The State of Texas has been taxed with attempting to throw off what has been termed the irrevocable condition on which her right of representation was conceded to her. On that subject I desire to say that the Constitution does not recognize two classes of States with different rights and powers. Every State entitled to representation stands upon an equal rooting with every other State in all respects whatsoever. The sole condition upon which States are entitled to representation and to be regarded as in full accord with all other States in the Federal Government is obedience to the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and there can be no conditions irrevocable in their character that are not demanded by the Constitution of the United States. It is a very common thing I find here to use a tone of argument in reference to southern States and southern representatives which would imply that there is some distinction between them and other States and Senators and Representatives from other States of the Union. I have only this to say in reference to the State of Texas or any other southern State: If there is anything in the reconstruction laws of Congress providing for a representation of those States that places them as States upon any different footing here from any other State, north, south, east, or west, such provisions are, in my judgment, void. Not only are they void, but they are injurious in their character as affecting the nature of our institutions; as affecting the equilibrium of the Union. The instance that has been cited with respect to the State of Texas in her amended constitution does not seem to me to be in any degree in conflict with the provisions of the reconstruction act under which she was admitted to representation; but if there is a conflict between them, if her present constitution, as her people have seen proper to frame it, is in accord with the Constitution of the United States and is not in conflict with any of its provisions, if it is republican in form as that instrument requires, then I insist that the State of Texas is not to be arraigned because she has seen proper to make a different constitution than the one under which she was admitted to representation, any more than any State which has formed a constitution under an enabling act of Congress and may have been admitted into the Union on an equal footing in all respects with every other State is prohibited in her own good time and when her people so desire from remodeling that constitution so as to put other and different provisions in it.

What is the complaint, so far as the State of Texas is concerned? That she has made some change in her proposed constitution in reference to her common schools. One of those changes she made to conform her constitution and organic law to the decisions of her own supreme court, the court having held that the provisions of the constitution of 1869, under which she was admitted, had violated the vested rights of the counties with respect to the county school land and school fund. It was stated in the course of this debate that in the judgment of Congress—and that of course meant the majority at that time—it was highly essential that the State of Texas should have a permanent school system and that education should be disseminated among all her people. For that purpose peculiar exactions had been made at the time of her admission with respect to that question. Yet it seems that these exactions had the effect to take the school fund belonging to the inhabitants of counties and blend it with the common-school fund of the State, disregarding the vested rights of the counties in regard to that fund. The supreme court of the State having pronounced that unconstitutional, as affecting vested rights, the people of the State in reframing their constitution very properly thought that it would be a proper thing for them to make their constitution conform to that decision. There was nothing new in that decision. The same principle has been settled in a number of other States by their supreme courts. The supreme court of the State of Missouri, of the State of Ohio, of the State of Indiana, each and all, had decided that where lands had been vested in a township, or a county, for the use and benefit of the inhabitants of that county or township for common-school purposes, it was not competent for the State, even in a change of its organic law, to take that money and blend it with the common-school fund of the State.

But again, it is complained that in her constitution of 1869 there was a provision that she should forever set apart one-fourth of her entire revenue for common-school purposes, and in her present constitution she simply provides that it shall not exceed one-fourth, vesting in the Legislature of the State from time to time the power to determine what amount of her gross revenues upon her general levies shall be set apart for common-school purposes. This is said to be in violation of the compact under which it is claimed she was readmitted to representation. Her reconstruction constitution required that one-fourth of her whole revenue should be set apart for all time, it mattered not what her common-school fund might be. It seems from the tables that have been presented here that she has now a common-school fund of over $2,000,000 invested in Government bonds, and over sixty million acres of land, selected and unselected, that are to be disposed of and to go into the common-school fund as a permament endowment of that fund. From these sources and others she might pile up her school fund until she was enabled to keep her schools open twelve months in the year in every school district and extend the privilege of education to every child throughout the entire State out of this endowment alone, and yet under this constitution, which is claimed to be in the nature of a compact and to contain irrevocable provisions, she would still be required to set apart one-fourth of her whole revenue to go into that common-school fund, whether it was needed or not.

This question might as well be considered and met now before the country as not. The intimation has gone forth in this debate that if these conditions termed irrevocable with respect to the State of Texas and other southern States are not continued and complied with whatever may be the local interests of the people in regard to them, at some time or other the Congress of the United States or the Federal Government will undertake to deal with them for having exercised just such powers as every other State exercises.

Mr. President, the animus of this whole question may perhaps be found in one expression contained in the speech of the distinguished Senator from Vermont at the very close of his speech. Speaking of the irrevocable laws that had been imposed upon the people of the States lately in rebellion, he says:

> We have only enacted wholesome, equal laws, that meet in the State of Vermont—we having similar State laws—with the universal approbation of everybody.

These laws meet with the universal approbation of everybody in the State of Vermont, and therefore they ought to be good enough for the State of Texas or any other State. That is the Procrustean bed by which the rights of other States are to be measured. Such good and wholesome laws as meet the approbation of the people of a particular State are to be pressed upon the people of every other State, especially upon that part of our country which was engaged in rebellion. No, sir; that proposition will not do. If that doctrine is to be presented and pressed, difficulties are still ahead of us that it is very hard to see the end of, there must be but one test upon this question. There must be but one demand made in regard to this matter, and that is the test of the Constitution of the United States, the demand that every State shall conform its constitution and laws to that Constitution and obey the laws made in pursuance thereof. Whatever is asserted outside of that is as revolutionary in its character as the very act that it seeks to condemn on the part of the Southern States, not forcible, not military, but still a dangerous attempt to overturn a fundamental principle of our Government that cannot meet with any favor when it comes to be examined before the people.

When General Grant in his brief letter eight years ago accepted the nomination tendered him by the republican national convention he closed it with the laconic sentence, "Let us have peace." When will we have peace? When will that time come? Will it be reached by attempting to undermine the principles of our Government and destroy the harmony of our system by dwarfing certain States of the Union, and to hold over them in terrorem the threat of reconstruction if they do not conform their action to what is claimed to be irrevocable conditions upon which they were admitted again to representation here? No, sir; we cannot have peace by such means. Peace can only come when we once more have a perfect Union by a clear and distinct recognition of the rights of the several States under the constitution; when there shall be no distiction claimed between any States that are represented in the Federal Union.

When there shall be but one demand made upon any State, that of obedience to the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, and when we shall know neither North, South, East, nor West in regard to the administration of those laws; when that time shall come then we may "have peace." It will be a peace founded upon a reunion of the different sections of this country under the one common bond of the Constitution, and may defy even time itself. It will be a restoration of our old ship of state with all its sails set to the breeze. Then it may be in the power of the whole people of this broad land to join in singing—

Sail on, O ship of state!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!

We know what master laid thy keel,
What workmen wrought thy ribs of steel;
Who made each mast, and sail, and rope;
What anvils rang, what hammers beat;
In what a forge and what a heat,
Were shaped the anchors of thy hope.

We can never reach that by constantly criminating and recriminating, and by distorting the difficulties that must necessarily arise from time to time in various sections of the country, particularly in the southern sections of the country, growing out of the anomalous condition in which the people there are placed. If the whole people of this country, North and South, could once come together on a common plane and mingle together so as to understand each other, so as to become acquainted with each other thoroughly, then would this sectional prejudice vanish, then would cease these attempts to distort unfortunate difficulties and lawless acts that the civil authorities for the time being may not be able to cope with or put down; in a very short time anything like color line in the South would be broken up. New parties would form upon real issues of policy and statesmanship, and the dangers that are still ahead of us would forever pass away.

Mr. President, I desire to say something, not exactly in reply to the distinguished Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] but upon a proposition in the same general line of discussion. He concluded his very able partisan speech by saying that the question now before the country was whether the democratic party should be restored to power. He very properly omitted from his stand-point another question that very naturally arose along with that, and that is, Can the republican party stand the ordeal of the trial before the bar of public opinion? Because those two things necessarily to a very considerable extent run together. When you consider whether you will bring one party into power, you very naturally consider whether the party in power ought to remain there, whether its course and conduct have been such as to entitle it to a still further lease of that power. I propose to examine this other question which runs along with the one stated by him. Has the republican party so conducted itself as to entitle it to the continued confidence of the people of this country? In his opening remarks the Senator spoke of the platform adopted by the democratic party in its recent convention at Saint Louis. He said it commenced with a demand for reform. It would be very natural to inquire whether there was that condition of things now existing that makes such a demand proper? Has the republican party recognized such a condition of things? I shall not examine the record of that party behind the canvass of 1868, but I shall commence with reading the seventh resolution adopted by it in its national convention of that year. It is as follows:

The Government of the United States should be administered with strict economy; and the corruptions that have been so shamefully nursed and fostered by Andrew Johnson call loudly for radical reform.

So it seems that when the party met in convention in 1868 it found corruption in the Government. It charges that this corruption had been "carefully nursed" by Andrew Johnson, who held the presidential office by the support of the republican party, and it insisted that corruptions in office should no longer continue.

The people took them at their promise and elected the candidates they nominated on that occasion, General Grant, and Mr. Colfax, of my own State. Before the term of office had expired under that election, I am sorry to say that the Vice-President was involved in some difficulties growing out of a Credit Mobilier and in the receipt of certain moneys which a Mr. Oakes Ames, of the republican party, charged him with having received as a part of the fruits of this fraudulent corporation; and in his discharging himself from that charge Mr. Colfax disclosed a very strange increase in his exchequer by donations made to him by a very liberal-minded man in the city of New York who had a contract with the Government for furnishing envelopes. How that question of veracity has ever been settled between Mr. Ames and the Vice-President elected on this platform I am unable to state, nor is the matter of much consequence. But the four years passed away, and it seems that when the republican party assembled again in national convention they had not fully accomplished this work of reform. In fact, matters had not improved, but had grown worse, and involved the whole system of our civil service. The corruptions which had been so "shamefully nursed and fostered" by Andrew Johnson still seemed to cling to the body-politic, and in 1872 they took another tack upon this question. Their fifth resolution is as follows:

Any system of civil service under which the subordinate positions of the Government are considered rewards for mere party zeal is fatally demoralizing; and we therefore favor a reform of the system by laws which shall abolish the evils of patronage and make honesty, efficiency, and fidelity the essential qualifications for public positions, without practically creating a life-tenure of office.

That is what they said four years ago. They were going to introduce an entirely new system of civil service, one where honesty and efficiency were to be the sole qualification. They proposed to strike down the system by which political patronage was given to men on account of their party zeal. Would it not be interesting to see how much of that they have accomplished? Where is that civil service they promised us then that should be based on these exalted ideas of capacity and honesty? Where is that system of laws which "abolish the evils of patronage" and "make honesty, efficiency, and fidelity the essential qualifications for office?" Where are these reforms that they thus promised?

But, Mr. President, let me come on down to their present position on this subject. In their platform adopted at Cincinnati in June last they say:

We rejoice in the quickened conscience of the people concerning political affairs and will hold all public officers to a rigid responsibility, and engage that the prosecution and punishment of all who betray official trust shall be speedy, thorough, and unsparing.

That is a most remarkable declaration made less than two months ago in the city of Cincinnati. They rejoice in the quickened conscience of the people. I am one of the doubting Thomases on that subject. I cannot believe that they rejoice in that quickened conscience. It seems to me that they are more like the Hibernian who was trembling in the prisoners' dock, and when the judge said to him, "You need not be alarmed, Patrick; you shall have justice done to you," replied, "Oh! faith, your honor, and that is just what I object to." [Laughter.] When they talk about their joy at the quickened conscience of the people, in view of all their surroundings, it is not strange that plain, practical people should doubt their sincerity.

But what do they propose to do? Hold all public officers to a "rigid responsibility, and engage that the prosecution and punishment of all who betray official trust shall be speedy, thorough, and unsparing." Here are their promises, what have been their performances? What has been their past record? What fruits have they brought forth from such an abundant bloom of promises? "For by their fruits ye shall know them." Running along with this specious declaration of theirs, they denounced the corruption of the administration of Andrew Johnson, after they had put it out of his power to remove an officer by their tenure of office law. Then four years after they proposed a radical change in the civil-service system by legislation, by which the patronage of the Administration should be controlled so that it should no longer be given out to men on account of partisan services; and at Cincinnati they expressed their great joy at the fact of the quickened conscience of the people on the subject of public affairs. Well, sir, in that time we have had the Credit Mobilier, and then came the Sanborn contracts, by which in certain cases one-half the revenue was given to the party who collected the money. Fifty per cent. of the collections! That was much better than the man who was engaged in picking up lime; he said it required no capital, and all that he got was clear gain, but still he had to find something before he realized any gains at all. But under this Sanborn contract the thing was already at hand in the form of a tax levied. "O, but," they say "was not the Secretary of the Treasury who permitted these contracts to be made driven from his office by the action of the republican party?" No; public opinion compelled him to resign the secretaryship, and then he was appointed to an office for life and confirmed by the republican Senate. That was administering punishment speedily and with a vengeance. Not much of a vengeance! To be kicked out of an office that would expire with the life of the Administration and be placed in one that would only expire with the life of the occupant is not very harsh punishment.

Then came Leet and Stocking, young adventurers, into whose hands was intrusted the general-order business for the port of New York, and who in a short time, less than twelve months, without any capital whatever of their own, filched from the commerce of that one port over $100,000. Their punishment was speedy. When the merchants of New York, aroused at the injustice and smarting under this extortion, demanded an investigation, their punishment was to let them off with their ill-gotten gains.

Then under this Administration and under these promises of reform we find a firm in New Jersey, the Cattell Brothers, who it seems have made enormous sums of money as brokers for contracts in the Navy Department, brokerage on contracts that they obtained. There is no corruption about that that I know of, but it seems strange and singular that this firm, one of whom was formerly, as I am informed, a copartner of the present Secretary of the Navy, should be able to sit down at the door of the Navy Department and there take toll day by day and throughout the year from all who come forward to get contracts, until the toll was counted up by thousands and tens of thousands of dollars.

Then the late Secretary of War made a good thing out of the post-traderships. One post, not perhaps a very important one either, for we understand that the sales at that post for a year did not amount to over $100,000 or $150,000, paid money that went almost directly into the pockets of the Secretary of War until he had received over $21,000 in the course of four or five years, receiving it quarterly. That was better than the tub-mill. A few such positions as that would make any man's fortune; and yet the speedy justice that has been promised has so far not been meted out, as far as I can understand.

But there is one thing, the whisky frauds, where punishment has been meted out to some of the offenders. There was one Department of the Government that was under the control of a man who seems to have thought that an enforcement of the law was a necessary obligation resting upon him as a public officer, and he therefore called around him other men who had similar ideas on that subject and they commenced the enforcement of the laws and did break up a number of rich and powerful rings that had been formed in various States to defraud the revenue and to contribute to the corruption fund of the republican party for election purposes, but by no means reached the whole of them, by no means accomplished all that might have been accomplished in that way. It is true as this investigation went on they drew nearer and nearer around the seat and center of power until it entered the very portals of the White House. I do not believe that General Grant has any taint of personal dishonesty about him. I never have believed it. I believe so far as his honesty and personal integrity are concerned they are without reproach; but he had given his confidence to men in regard to whom it cannot be said that they stood like him, and as this investigation went on it reached nearer and nearer to that confidence. It is true, General Grant said, and it was a worthy saying, as these investigations seemed to point with more directness to some in whom he had confided and trusted, "Let no guilty man escape;" yet when it came to a final attempt to enforce the law, such arrangements were made, such instrumentalities used, such action taken by the courts, that another saying came in, and that was, "let no guilt-edged man be punished." I do not think that any one believes for a moment that these investigations would have reached their end if they were still continued to be pressed.

But a very singular thing took place. The people had become conscious that something was going wrong. It was no idle declaration when it was stated in the republican platform that the "conscience" of the people concerning public affairs has become quickened. The people proposed to take the man who had inaugurated these prosecutions and that reform—I mean the people represented in the republican party—and put him at the head of affairs and see if on being placed there he would accomplish for the whole system of Government what he was endeavoring to accomplish in one Department of it. But the people were not represented at Cincinnati, and he was not placed there, and then in a very short time he was invited to "step down and out," and those who aided him most in carrying on these investigations and bringing these whisky rings to justice were one by one invited to "step down and out" until a complete change was made. Now I will say of that Department, instead of that Secretary, another good man has been placed at the head of the Department, but whether he can accomplish the work which was thus commenced as one who had already his hand upon the work and was engaged in going forward to its completion is a very different question. But what a commentary on the pledge of the republican party to see that speedy punishment should be meted out to the guilty. The guilty are permitted to escape, and the man who attempted to bring them to justice is driven from office in disgrace.

It seems to me that when this canvass opens and we come to consider whether the democratic party shall be restored to power the people will not find it difficult to decide between that party which can point to its past record on which no taint of dishonesty rests and the republican party which has only made promises to break them. The verdict in regard to the republican party will be, "Weighed in the balance, and found wanting."

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of continuing this debate, but rather to lay before the Senate tables touching one or two questions that have been the subject of discussion recently in the Senate. First, I ask attention to a table, which I will send to the reporter to be printed when I have considered it, showing the public debt of the United States each year from 1836 to 1871, when the change was made in the system of stating the accounts in the Treasury. This table is made up upon each of the plans which have been the subject of discussion. One of the tables shows the debt each year by the receipts and expenditures account, and the other table shows it by the issues and redemption account. The difference has been frequently stated to the Senate that the issues and redemption account is the account in the Register's Office of bonds and other securities which have passed through his Office, whether they have been actually issued to the public and the proceeds received or not, and also the amount outstanding as appears from his books on a given day whenever there is a settlement, whether or not some of those securities have been actually redeemed by the Treasurer and have not been entered on the books of the Register. The amount by receipts and expenditures represents the public debt by warrants covering into the Treasury the proceeds of bonds sold, and also by warrants authorizing the issue of payments made on account of the public debt. It is apparent therefore that at any particular time these two statements must differ if there are any transactions going on in the Treasury requiring time. This table gives the commencement of the public debt in 1836, and the increase of that debt each year as appears from the reports made by the Secretary of the Treasury upon both systems. The two accounts are to be found in the statement of the public debt for the years 1870 and 1871.

The other statement of the public debt by issues and redemptions commences at the same time. It is given for each year, and the increase of the public debt by each of these statements for each year is shown. At the end of the period named, 1870, when the account was opened in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury by receipts and expenditures, it appears that the aggregate of increase upon the two systems of accounting agree, with the exception of $426,399.98. That difference was explained by the Treasury Department in the report which the Finance Committee made to the Senate a short time since, and is to be found on page 21 of that report; but in order that the explanation of this difference might appear it has been appended to this statement.

Now, it appears that these two statements for this period of time, however they differ, as they do differ from the very nature of the accounting for particular years, show in the aggregate for this entire period of time the same increase of the public debt by each system; and therefore each is a test of the accuracy of the other. This discrepancy of $426,399.98, which occurred some time ago, is explained fully in detail in this account. I cannot but think that this statement presented to the Senate under the authority of the Treasury Department where it was made, and presented to the country, will be conclusive upon the point which has been raised here:

This difference or apparent increase of the debt as shown in the finance report for 1870 consists of the following items:

Amount of the bonds purchased for the sinking and special funds prior to July 1, 1870, but not received and paid for prior to the passage of the act of July 14, 1870, and consequently not deducted from the outstanding public debt on July 1, 1870, on "receipts and expenditures" account	$3,689,100 00
(See note 14, finance report, 1871, page 7.)
Amounts not included in the "issues and redemptions" account, but included in the "receipts and expenditures" account:
Old debt, $57,665; interest, $64,164.81	121,829 81
Mexican indemnity	1,104 91
Bounty land-scrip	3,975 00
(See note 10, finance report for 1871, page 7.)
Amount advanced to the Treasurer to pay interest on certificates of indebtedness, used to redeem principal, thus making a difference between the two accounts of	21,425 52
Amount of Treasury notes of 1857, checked off on the loan-books in excess of redemptions	5,100 00
(See note 6, finance report for 1871, page 7.)
Amount of loan of 1848 redeemed and twice deducted on loan-books	800 00
(See note 9, finance report for 1871, page 7.)
"In the examination of the account of the Texan indemnity loan, it was discovered that $30.62 had been covered as principal which should have been covered as interest, also that $17,080 was covered as principal which should have been covered as premium"	17,110 62
(See note 7, finance report for 1871, page 7.)
"In the quarter ending September 30, 1868, $150.22 was covered to the credit of principal of the loan of 1863, which should have been covered as premium"	150 22
(See note 3, finance report for 1871, page 7.)
Miscellaneous covering-warrant No. 459, of December 20, 1865, covered as receipts from principal of 5.20 loan of 1865, $995,247, which should have been covered as premium	995,247 00
Making a total discrepancy of		$4,855,843 08
From which deduct the following items:
Purloined Treasury notes redeemed under the first section of the act of August 10, 1846, charged on "receipts and expenditures" account to this loan, being equivalent to a duplicate issue, should be excluded altogether	23,289 86
Lost note of 1860 redeemed on bond of indemnity, and again redeemed when the note was presented by the holder	500 00
Amount of certain 7.30 notes of 1861 returned by the Treasurer as not issued, and canceled, as shown by the Register's books	$45,000 00
Amount of old demand and legal-tender notes stolen from the Treasury after the Treasurer had received credit for their redemption, and again put in circulation. These amounts were recovered, but, instead of being deposited as debits to the loans, were covered as miscellaneous receipts:
Old demand notes	18,000 00
Legal-tenders	5,996 06
(The actual amount recovered on account of legal-tenders was $6,000, $3.94 in excess of the amount necessary to make the account good.)
An examination of the loans of one and two year notes of 1863 shows that the amount outstanding is $140 less than shown by the "issues and redemptions" account	140 00
Amount of compound-interest notes lost at sea in the steamship Republic, paid to Ober, Nanson & Co. per act of February 22, 1867	59,500 00
(See note 11, finance report of 1871, page 7.)
Discount on fifty-million loan of July and August, 1861, only the net amount of receipts from this loan being covered into the Treasury. The actual discount at which this note was negotiated was $5,338,768.09, but the receipts were increased by $1,134,168.71 accrued interest	4,204,599 38
Discount on loan of 1842	42,417 80
Amount of bonds of the loan of June, 1864, issued to the Plainfield Bank of New Jersey, in lieu of same amount stolen before delivery to the bank	30,000 00
Difference explained		426,399 98

I will also present to the Senate in this connection and with the design that the two may be printed in the RECORD the debt statement as prepared by Secretary McCulloch on the 1st day of March, 1869, and also the debt statement that was subsequently prepared in a more detailed form, showing the changes that were made in the debt statement under my administration, of which complaint has been made, and showing also that when the difference is taken into account in regard to the Pacific railroad bonds and charging the earned interest to the debt they are precisely the same:

The foregoing is a correct statement of the public debt, as appears from the books and Treasurer's returns in the Department, on the 1st of July, 1869.

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL, Secretary of the Treasury.

I will also take this occasion to call attention to another matter which has been the subject of discussion here and which was referred to particularly last evening by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.] The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] this morning called the attention of the Senate to the circumstance that in 1868, when the national republican party met in convention, a resolution was passed declaring that there were corruptions in the Government which had been nursed by Andrew Johnson, and that we promised, if power were confided to us again, that we would make some reform. He also said that we proposed this year to do the same thing. I have in my hands a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury in reply to a letter which I addressed to him. I will ask the Clerk to read the letter, because I wish to establish the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury is responsible for the paper which I propose to lay before the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, August 10, 1876.

SIR: Your letter of above date requesting me to furnish you a statement of the receipts and disbursements of the Government from its organization down to June 30, 1875, exhibiting the amount of defalcations and the ratio of losses per $1,000 to the aggregate receipts and disbursements, arranged as nearly as practicable according to administrations, and also in periods prior and subsequent to June 30, 1861, has been received.

In reply I have the honor to transmit herewith the statement called for.

Very respectfully,

LOT M. MORRILL, Secretary.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The statement contains the receipts of the Government each year from its organization arranged by administrations. It shows also the losses per $1,000 on the receipts and the losses per $1,000 on the disbursements for each administration from the organization of the Government to the present time.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, WASHINTON, D. C., August 10, 1876.

Statement showing the receipts and disbursements of the Government from its organization to June 30, 1875; exhibiting also the amount of defalcations and the ratio of such losses per $1,000 to the aggregate received and disbursed, arranged as nearly as practicable in periods of Administrations, and also in the periods prior and subsequent to June 30, 1861; prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

* Includes disbursements on account of public debt, interest, premiums, and all civil expenses, exclusive of Post-Office.
† Including Post-Office and all other amounts collected or disbursed, and the losses thereon.

NOTES TO FOREGOING TABLES.

1. In cases where the accounts of defaulting officers embraced more than one period the losses, unless known to have occurred in other periods, have been charged to the periods in which the accounts were opened in this Department. In cases of defaulting banks, however, for want of other information, the losses have been charged to the periods in which they are reported on the books, though, doubtless, in several instances they actually occurred in previous periods.

2. No deductions have been made for amounts which may be collected hereafter, though a large percentage of the recent losses will doubtless be yet recovered.

3. In preparing this statement the receipts and disbursements since June 30, 1843, have been classified by fiscal years, as in the published official reports; the losses have in all cases been classified by calendar years, it not being practicable to separate the losses occurring in the fractional years of each period; but the periods compared being of the same length, the result is substantially correct.

I call attention to the difference between Johnson's and Grant's administrations to show that the promise which we made to the country in 1868 that things would be better in this respect if we were continued in power has been performed. Of all the immense disbursements of the administration of General Grant's Administration only thirty-four cents on the thousand dollars have been lost to the country.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask whether these receipts and disbursements of General Grant's term include the manipulations of the public debt? Do they include all the handling of money in the Treasury?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The statement includes all the operations of the Treasury; receipts and expenditures from revenue, public debt, and everything of the kind.

Mr. WALLACE. Does it include all the exchanges of bonds in manipulating the public debt?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir; and I may say that in the matter of the exchange of bonds there has never been one dollar lost during General Grant's Administration.

Mr. WALLACE. That is precisely what I want to get at; that these things in which there is no risk are taken into this total.

Mr. BOUTWELL. There is risk. Money comes in. We took at one time $20,000,000 of coin and had it accumulated at one moment. Will you say there is no risk in the receipt and disbursement of such vast sums of money, relying entirely on integrity, because a bond is like "the baseless fabric of a vision" in a case of such magnitude as that?

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania last evening instituted a comparison between the return of the Treasury Department since 1836 with the statement made by Mr. Woodbury when he was Secretary of the Treasury in 1839, and asked the Senate to believe that the statement made by Mr. Woodbury when he was Secretary of the Treasury, upon a call by the House of Representatives, was more trustworthy than the statement which we now have from the Treasury in regard to the losses during Mr. Van Buren's administration.

Mr. WALLACE. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts simply whether the statement now produced concurs with the statement furnished under the resolution of February 19—whether it does not differ in its totals and its results?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I presume not; I do not know about that. It is a statement which the Secretary of the Treasury sends to us. I have only to call attention to the letter which Mr. Woodbury sent to the House of Representatives with the statement to which the Senator from Pennsylvania called the attention of the Senate last evening to show that while there was entire integrity on the part of Mr. Woodbury, because he disclosed the ground on which he proceeded, nevertheless that the statement is of no value to us in our efforts to ascertain the truth in regard to the losses during Mr. Van Buren's administration. In the first place he excludes the losses by "the pet banks;" he excludes losses in the Post-Office Department. Mr. Woodbury in his letter, which is dated December 9, 1839, (which is House of Representatives Executive Document No. 10 of the Twenty-sixth Congress, first session,) says:

So far, also, as any payments have been made from time to time, and proved or credited, since or before 1837, the original balance has been reduced to the amount rendered proper from that cause. In obtaining correct results as to all the real losses, a further deduction has been made by the accounting officers of such amounts as appear to be well secured by sureties, extents on lands, &c., though not actually paid. After that, a general deduction of about 20 per cent., on an average, has likewise been made from the aggregate in all cases of the old collectors of taxes and internal revenue, and of all disbursing officers connected with the Army and Navy, on account of the more probable loss of vouchers, and on account of informalities, equitable set-offs and allowances, which could not be granted without special legislation, and on account of insolvencies, accidents, deaths, removals to distant States, and of other causes which may probably have prevented the interposition of just defenses and claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A very elastic way of getting at a fact.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In submitting that report to the House of Representatives at that time he made statements as to the mode in which the result was reached that deprives it now of all value whatsoever, especially in presence of the fact that we have from the records of the Treasury Department a statement showing exactly how much was realized. The probability is that there was a failure to recover the claims which he estimated were of some value, supported as they were by personal sureties and what he calls extents on lands, the exact nature of which I do not know, but I suppose some sort of execution or process by which something was to be recovered, and after the failure of those, as in most instances there probably was a failure to recover, we have the exact result. Probably if he had lived to this time he would have realized a disappointment.

Mr. DAVIS. Is the Senator through?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORDON. I suggest that the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. DENNIS. I ask the Senator to give way for a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. I have very little to say; I shall not exceed five minutes, probably, and as the Senator from Massachusetts finished his remarks upon the statement from the Treasury Department made in answer to a resolution offered by me in regard to defaulters, I want to notice that for a moment, and then refer to the public-debt statements.

We find in the statement as made, and as I think unfairly made, the total disbursements from January, 1834, to June 30, 1861, twenty-six years, to be $1,369,977,502. We find from July 1, 1861, to June 30, 1875, fourteen years, they were $12,566,892,569; showing that bonds, and probably the Treasury notes, the greenbacks, and other notes handled in the Department must have been brought into this calculation for the purpose of making the percentage of loss the least. We find that in twenty-six years $1,396,000,000 only were handled, while from 1861 up to 1875, a period of fourteen years, there were $12,500,000,000 handled, and the comparison is drawn and the percentage made on the enormous sum I have just mentioned; showing that in one case there were only brought into the account the actual moneys collected and paid out through disbursing agents, and in the other case there must have been brought in the bonds and other securities that passed through the Department.

But that is not all. According to this statement that the total losses from 1861 to 1875 were nearly $10,000,000, while for the twenty-six years previous they were about $12,000,000, showing that even for the fifteen years the loss is three-fourths as great as the loss of twenty-six years previously.

This statement is made up for a purpose, and that purpose is to show one period as large as it can be got and the other as little as it can be. That is the long and short of it.

Now as to the public debt. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts. I should be glad to ask him who made the table just presented by him?

Mr. BOUTWELL. It comes here under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury. If the Senator wishes to know what clerk prepared it——

Mr. DAVIS. O, no; my question was to ascertain whether it was made by request from the Senator from Massachusetts to the Treasury Department.

Mr. BOUTWELL. O, yes, I will say that I understood it was made or nearly made before I made the request. It was commenced and perhaps nearly completed before I made the request.

Mr. DAVIS. I am not calling in question why it was made. The object of the question is to know whether it comes officially.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The letter of the Secretary was read in the presence of the Senate, sending it to me. It is not official to the Senate perhaps, but it is an official table.

Mr. DAVIS. The table has been ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and of course we shall all see it. I cannot analyze it without seeing it; but I take it for granted that it is made in the line of the report of the Finance Committee as to the explanation of the increase of the public debt. Any Senator who will examine will find the theory they worked on in that particular cannot sustain itself. Take the year previous to the remodeling of the debt in the Treasury Department and you find about $90,000,000 of an increase from the year it was reported. In other words, in 1869 the Secretary of the Treasury reported the debt in round numbers at $2,400,000,000, and the next year that amount was changed and made about $90,000,000 more. This system of subtraction from one year and adding to another cannot explain any one year with itself. It may explain a series of years on a certain theory, but cannot explain a single year; and if a single year cannot be explained on its own basis——

Mr. EATON. I desire to say to the Senator from Ohio, as I see him now present, that I hope he will not leave the floor. I have a word to say to him.

Mr. DAVIS. It cannot explain itself. For instance, in the year 1862 you find that the public debt was stated in round numbers at $514,000,000. It stood at $514,000,000 from that time up to 1870, and in 1870 when the debt statement was remodeled and restated and then it was made $524,000,000, making a difference of about $10,000,000. Now the theory started to subtract one year from another will not explain that, cannot explain it.

But there is another important item in all this explanation concerning the debt and expenditures and receipts. All the explanations that have been made have gone to the public debt. It is well known to all the Senators that in the remarks I submitted to the Senate I referred to expenditures and receipts that had stood upon the annual reports to Congress, some of them as much as thirty years, and at the expiration of that time, or in 1870, they were restated, and in some cases made larger and in some cases made smaller; but in the aggregate there was a considerable increase as to expenditures. As to the receipts they were made smaller in some cases, larger in others; but when you come to the aggregate amount they were made considerably less. The explanation, as I understand from the Senator from Massachusetts, in the paper that is presented goes only to the public debt.

Mr. GORDON. Will my friend allow me to make a motion?

Mr. DAVIS. I will hear the purpose.

Mr. GORDON. I move that at half past five o'clock we take a recess until eight o'clock, and then re-assemble for debate only. There are a number of gentlemen who are anxious to speak, and I am very anxious to go home.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is adopting too popular manners altogether.

Mr. GORDON. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate take a recess from half past five to eight o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does not that change the rules about debate only?

Several SENATORS. Say half past seven.

Mr. GORDON. I will modify it to half past seven.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate take a recess from half past five to half past seven.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I understood the Senator from Georgia to propose that we meet for debate only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the hour will be eight o'clock.

Mr. GORDON. I am willing to modify it to eight o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY. If it is understood that there are to be no votes taken, the earlier we meet the better.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no such understanding. I do not believe in adopting the manners of the tribunes of the people in this body exactly. If we are going to sit let us sit for business, which includes debate. I think we had better hold on now. We shall finish this presently.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to take a recess from half past five to half past seven o'clock.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. When the statement presented by the Senator from Massachusetts is printed I shall as a matter of course have some remarks to submit upon it; but as to the statement about defaulters a good deal has been said of that and it has been ordered to be printed in the RECORD. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts has adopted that as being correct and coming from himself?

Mr. BOUTWELL. It comes from the Treasury Department. The Secretary of the Treasury sends it to me and I present it. My indorsement of that would not be worth much.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 561) for the relief of Major Junius T. Turner.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House insisted on its amendments to the bill (S. No. 1021) allowing the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails in their new iron steamships, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. A. M. WADDELL of North Carolina, Mr. J. K. LUTTRELL of California, and Mr. J. A. GARFIELD of Ohio managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4087) continuing the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide temporarily for the expenses of the Government;" in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

TEMPORARY PROVISION FOR EXPENDITURES.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask consent to call up the bill just passed by the House extending the existing appropriations, for three days, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 4087) continuing the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide temporarily for the expenses of the Government," and it was read. It continues and extends in full force and effect until and including the 14th day of August, 1876, the provisions of the act named.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Four days.

By unanimous consent the bill was read three times, and passed.

BILLS RECOMMITTED.

Mr. SARGENT. Some time since the Committee on Naval Affairs reported a bill (S. No. 932) for the relief of David De Haven. The committee supposed that the facts justified the report. They have some reason to doubt that now, and have instructed me to ask that it be recommitted. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. On the 8th instant, at the instance of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the bill (H. R. No. 2524) for the relief of certain soldiers of the Eighth Cavalry, Missouri State Militia, was reported adversely and the bill indefinitely postponed. I ask that that vote may be reconsidered and the bill recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. I have spoken to the chairman of the committee. It was reported in my absence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE HAMBURGH RIOTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution to print 10,000 extra copies of the President's message and accompanying document in relation to the late massacre at Hamburgh, South Carolina.

Mr. EATON. In his letter of acceptance the democratic candidate for the Presidency stated that for the last eleven years the Federal taxes amounted to $4,500,000,000. That was questioned by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who said it was incorrect, and he read certain figures or showed a table. I remember distinctly having a conversation with Mr. Tilden some six months ago when this question arose, and the same remark was made to me then that is made in his letter of acceptance now; and now I assert from the tables I have here—the fiscal year 1876 is not yet ended—that he is within the truth; that for the eleven past years the people have been taxed $4,607,574,202.23, and "figures do not lie," as the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] informs us. They do not lie; they are here unless they come from the Treasury Department false.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the table?

Mr. EATON. I assert it from the same table that the Senator from Ohio used. Of course, I take in that, as Mr. Tilden did, not 1876 but 1865, as one of the eleven years. The year 1876 is not ended and therefore the candidate is entirely right and entirely honorable.

Mr. SHERMAN. You include the last year of the war.

Mr. EATON. No matter; those were taxes that the Government took from the people and the people paid. That is the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. EATON. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator is right in supporting Tilden, and in including the last year of the war, because he was very much opposed to it, and it ought to be left out.

Mr. EATON. I am very much obliged to the honorable Senator from Vermont for interjecting something here in regard to Mr. Tilden's opposition to the war, it has so much to do with the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has a good deal to do with it.

Mr. EATON. A great deal to do with it, and Senators who cannot look beyond that one single thing cannot go into a question of figures, I am afraid, correctly.

Now, the candidate of the democratic party is within the truth, as generally democratic statements are within the truth; but it is $100,000,000 more than he says in his letter of acceptance. Let that go on the record. I ventured to suggest to the honorable Senator from Ohio not in the same words, because I do not use so many—he did not give me time—that Mr. Tilden's figures were more apt to be correct than his, whereupon the Senator from Ohio indulged in language in the highest degree unparliamentary and exceedingly offensive to me personally. I will not go so far as to say that it was insulting, but it came as near it as language ought to come on the floor of the Senate. This is not the place to use language of that character; it is not the arena for it. He ventured to use language and put it upon record. I do not object to it if he desires it to go there, but I desire to say here that it is not the language that one Senator should use to another; it is unparliamentary; it is offensive. I know he said afterward that he used it kindly. It is a sort of kindness that I do not fancy.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like the Senator to tell us what he reads from in support of this statement as to $4,600,000,000. I have the table before me.

Mr. EATON. I thought I said to the Senator that I excluded the year 1876, which has come in since Mr. Tilden's letter was written, and took the year previous, and I assert that the amount is more than $4,500,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend will still retain the floor, because I think I can convince him that he is in error. Here are two tables; one is receipts and the other expenditures. The allegation contained in the democratic platform applies only to the taxes levied upon the people of the United States; it does not apply to the expenditures of the people's money. A large portion of the money included in the $1,297,000,000, the cost of the last year of the war, was derived from loans, United States Treasury notes, bonds, &c., in various forms. All the taxes of every form, description, and kind, all the money that comes into the Treasury, except only from loans, is contained in the table I have in my hand. I will ask the Senator to look at it; I will hand it to him. I do not care whether you commence with the fiscal year 1865, which of course began July 1, 1864, or the next year, he is grossly in error. The receipts from taxes in the year 1865, commencing on the 1st of July, 1864, were only $333,000,000, while the next year, as soon as the war was over, for the fiscal year 1866 the taxes were $558,000,000. The Senator sees, therefore, that if he takes that year and omits the present he reduces rather than enlarges the figures. I again repeat, as perfectly and conclusively shown by this paper, that the aggregate receipts from all sources except from loans were $4,192,623,801 during the eleven years.

Mr. EATON. And thirty-four cents.

Mr. SHERMAN. And thirty-four cents, and that includes, my friend will see, $167,037,384 of premium on sales of gold. That is not revenue, or if it is it is balanced by the premium paid on bonds, because this was the very process by which we sold gold and bought bonds, both transactions being made on a currency basis. This $167,000,000 is not in the nature of money collected from the people; it is in the nature of a premium on gold, collected from the people it is true, but that was balanced by the premium paid on the purchases of bonds. But including that I again repeat that the revenue from all sources, from internal taxes, from direct taxes, from customs duties, from sales of public lands, from premiums on loans and sales of gold coin, and other miscellaneous items all included, was but $4,192,623,000 for the eleven years, and therefore Governor Tilden was wrong when he stated it at $4,500,000,000, and the Senator was wrong.

Look at the other table which the Senator now brings to support his theory. If he says the expenditures of this Government for eleven years, including the payment of the interest on the debt, pensions, and all that, amount to $4,600,000,000, I may agree with that, because the amount expended in one single year, the last of the prosecution of the war, was $1,297,555,000, or more than one-fourth of the whole aggregate of expenses since that time. Those were expenses and they were paid by loans. But that is not what Governor Tilden says; it is not what the democratic platform says. He says we have collected in the form of tax $4,500,000,000. I say it is not true, and whether you include the year 1864, or 1865, or any other year, or take any eleven years whatever, you may take any eleven years from the beginning of the war to this time commencing at the beginning of the war, and we never collected that aggregate of taxes in eleven years. We have collected more in the last eleven years than we did in the eleven years from the beginning of the war. The largest taxes collected by the Government of the United States in any one year were $558,000,000, which was collected the year after the war was over; the next year it was $490,000,000 when we commenced reducing taxes, but during the war our tax revenues were $41,000,000, $51,000,000, $110,000,000, $264,000,000, and $333,000,000. As a matter of course, during the war our taxation did not yield so much revenue as it did afterward. Taking eleven years of the highest taxation levied on the people of the United States in any form, and the aggregate of that including the premium on gold is only $4,192,000,000.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator why is it that he states that the premium upon gold is not to be classed as part of the public revenue? Does not all the gold that comes to the Treasury come from the people? Where does it come from? It comes from the duties on our imports, and the merchants, who are our citizens, who buy that gold, pay for it, and therefore if they pay into the Treasury so much in gold which, when transmuted into our present currency, amounts to $167,000,000 more, certainly that is so much more that goes into the Treasury, because the figures in the Senator's hand are of paper money, and not of gold; and therefore it seems to me very plain that when you ask what has been the burden upon the people and you pay it in paper money and you draw a part of that in gold which they had to pay you in gold, if you estimate their burden you must estimate it in paper, and not in gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me answer the question of the Senator before it gets so long that I shall forget it. He asks me why this premium on gold ought not to be counted. I will say that the way in which the business was conducted was simply a mode of book-keeping. For instance, this gold was used for the purchase of the bonds of the United States. In my judgment—and I criticise the action of Mr. McCulloch, Mr. BOUTWELL, and these other gentlemen with some reluctance—this ought to have been made a direct operation by the use of gold in the purchase of the bonds and this complication of accounts ought never to have arisen. The gold ought to have been used for the purchase of bonds; but they preferred, on the other hand, to sell the gold and then use the greenbacks resulting from that sale in purchasing bonds for which they paid a premium. But admitting that the Senator is correct, still the total amount is only $4,192,000,000, and Governor Tilden is wrong. I do not impute to him any intentional wrong, but he is wrong in his figures.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask another question growing out of that theory? and I apply for information to the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I observe that that table states ne t revenue, net expenditures. I ask him whether there is not a large p ortion of the revenue which is there stated as net on which there was an expense in collection which was borne by the parties that brought the revenue to the Government?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am glad my friend asked me that question. I answered the same question to the Senator from Connecticut, and I now say publicly that every dollar of money from any source whatever that comes to any man for the use of the Government of the United States goes into the Treasury. Formerly it was not so.

Mr. BAYARD. I mean on these tables.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is meant by "net revenue" is revenue derived from other sources than bonds, because the bond account is kept separate from the expenditure account. Formerly the expenses of collecting the customs revenue were paid out of the fund, and only the balance was covered into the Treasury; but that system was abolished many years ago when I first became a member of Congress, and the customs expenses are appropriated for just as any other service. When the internal-revenue service was started the same course was adopted. For one year or I think perhaps two years—the Senator from Massachusetts, who was the first Commissioner, can tell—the expenses of the internal-revenue system were paid out of the receipts; but that was abolished by the second law we passed on the subject of internal revenue, and all the money collected was carried into the Treasury and the expenses paid out in ordinary way of other expenditures. Collectors of internal revenue and the like were paid out of the general revenue.

Mr. BAYARD. What is there termed "net revenue" means in fact gross revenue, irrespective of the sale of bonds?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; it means the net revenue except sales of bonds.

Mr. BAYARD. It does not mean "net revenue," but gross revenue except the sales of bonds.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the fact. I have inquired myself if there is any source of revenue not carried into the Treasury, and it is only the bonds the account of which is kept separately. I believe the Senator will find on inquiry that that is the case. It is necessary to discriminate constantly in this table between expenditures and revenue, because every dollar of money paid out for any service or employment of the United States is paid out of the Treasury, and if the Senator can find any money that is paid from any other source I am certain I will be with him, as it is one of those trust funds that I have been trying always to have covered into the Treasury.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President——

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield for a motion for a recess?

Mr. EATON. No, I shall be through in a moment.

The Senator from Ohio has doubtless satisfied himself but he has not satisfied me, and his explanation will not satisfy the country. A few words will end this sort of financiering. Let us take his recapitulation of the expense of the Government. It amounts in the eleven years to $4,607,574. What is it made up of? Interest on the public debt. Where did the money come from to pay the interest on the public debt? Out of the pockets of the people and from nowhere else. Neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor the chairman of the Committee on Finance can find any other place to get that money from. What next? Pensions? Where did the money come from to pay the pensions of the Government? Out of the pockets of the people, the tax-payers, and from nowhere else. The expenses of the Indians, which amounted in this term to about $60,000,000, form the next item, and where did that come from I pray you? Out of the pockets of the people. What next? The Navy Department, the War Department, the miscellaneous items. Where, I pray you, did all this money come from? The Senator from Ohio sticks in the bark.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can tell my friend where $950,000,000 of it came from in a single year.

Mr. EATON. Where?

Mr. SHERMAN. The last year of the war we spent $1,297,000,000. We collected in the way of taxes $333,000,000. That makes a difference of about $950,000,000, which we borrowed. It is part of the public debt.

Mr. EATON. But the interest is paid by the people and the money has been paid by the people. Whenever you reduce your debt you reduce it by taxation, and if you pay off part of this $950,000,000 it comes out of the pockets of the people. It is a part of this whole system. When the Senator from Ohio undertakes to say that Mr. Tilden has attempted to deceive the people of the United States, let him look to his own figures and to his Treasury Department. There is no other way to pay the debts of this people except by taxing this people, and if you borrow $500,000,000 to-day and pay it to-morrow, they pay it, because we get the money out of the earnings of the people to pay it; and it will not do to tell me or any other reflecting man that because this money is borrowed to-day and paid to-morrow it is not paid by the earnings of the people. Sir, Samuel J. Tilden was within the figures, as he will always be found to be when he makes statements as to figures.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from Texas yields to me to make a motion for a recess until half past seven.

Several SENATORS. Eight o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to say in his motion that only the resolution now before the Senate shall be in order to-night.

Mr. DENNIS. Before the motion is put, will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to move for an executive session?

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have an understanding. I will yield to the Senator from Maryland in a moment. May we have an understanding that only the measure now pending shall be in order this evening?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to call up a measure, not for action, but so that it will be in order to-morrow.

Mr. WINDOM. I modify my motion at the suggestion of several Senators to eight o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate take a recess until eight o'clock from this time.

Mr. DENNIS. I ask the Senator to withdraw that to allow me to move an executive session for a few moments.

Mr. WINDOM. I promised to do so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the motion be made to take effect on the termination of the executive session.

Mr. WINDOM. Very well. I will modify the motion to take effect at the conclusion of the executive session.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that motion in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. CONKLING. I object. Now, the Senator from Maryland can make his motion.

Mr. DENNIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WINDOM. I will renew my motion after the executive session.

The question being put, it was declared that the ayes appeared to prevail, when Mr. SARGENT called for a division.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the motion for executive session priority of a motion for a recess?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion for a recess has priority.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move then——

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to a point of order. The Senate is dividing. I submit to the Senator from Vermont that he is out of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am rising to make a motion like a motion to adjourn, and therefore in order.

Mr. CONKLING. My point is that the Senate is dividing. I insist on the Chair executing the order of the Senate. Let us have rules for all alike here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland moved an executive session; the Senator from California called for a division. The Senator from New York is in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Then let us have a division.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can I not now move for a recess?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do.

Mr. CONKLING. I object. I say the Senate is dividing, and I insist upon it that the Chair should enforce the rules against the Senator from Vermont as he does against me and everybody else.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So do I, but the rule is in my favor.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us see if we can have a division of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rose to move a recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair rules that the Senator from Vermont is in order.

Mr. CONKLING. While the Senate is dividing, does the Chair rule that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion for a recess is in order.

Mr. CONKLING. I appeal from that decision and I ask for the yeas and nays on that ruling. I do not mean to be disrespectful to the Chair, and now I will state my point. The Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS,] recognized by the Chair, moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. The Chair put that to a vote viva voce; the Senator demanded a division, and pending that division the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] interposed, or attempted to, a motion for a recess; and the Chair rules that before executing the order or dividing the Senate or completing the division, that motion is in order. From that decision I appeal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has misunderstood the point, although, as the motion is not debatable, I can only state it. Before the Chair undertook to take a division, before he asked anybody to rise, I rose to make a motion such as a motion to adjourn would be, a motion to take a recess; the Chair recognized me; and now I insist the motion is in order.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator say that after the motion for an executive session was put and after a division was demanded but before it begun he made his motion?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I say.

Mr. CONKLING. Then the Senator from Vermont knows as well as I do that that is the very case which interferes with executing the order of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I know exactly the reverse.

Mr. CONKLING. That question I propose to have the Senate vote on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. CONKLING. That when a division is ordered——

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is not debatable.

Mr. CONKLING. I am not debating.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York will state his point.

Mr. CONKLING. I appeal from a ruling that after a division has been demanded and a count challenged in that way, and before that division has taken place, in the middle of that vote, the Senator from Vermont can make any motion. I want the Senator from Vermont to abide by the rules.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So do I.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Vermont to rise to move a recess before the division was called for.

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir, I absolutely assert the contrary upon my veracity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then that would turn the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. And the Senator from Vermont has not insisted on any such thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would change the question entirely. The Chair understood the case thus: That the Senator from Maryland moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. The Chair decided that that motion seemed to be carried. The Senator from Vermont states that he rose to move a recess. If the Senator from Vermont states that before the call was made for a division he moved a recess, the Chair would entertain the motion. If it was made after, then the Senator from New York is correct and the Chair would overrule it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I state exactly this, partly just as the Senator from New York has stated it, that after the Chair had said "The ayes appear to have it," somebody called for a division, but before the Chair stated the question, and in that state of it exactly, before the Chair asked anybody to rise, and before the Senate was divided, I rose to move a recess; but I did not rise to move a recess until after somebody had said from his seat "I ask for a division." That, I believe, was exactly it. I think our recollection is the same.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not think we differ essentially.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon that statement of the case the Chair will sustain the point of order raised by the Senator from New York.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would appeal if it did not take too much time.

Mr. CONKLING. Now let us have the vote on going into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont will understand the Chair. He understood the Senator from Vermont to state that after the Senator from California asked for a division on the question, the Senator from Vermont rose to move a recess.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And before the Chair put the question of a division to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call of the Senator from California was a question of the decision of the Chair, and therefore the question was not settled and the Senate was then dividing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that is the unanimous judgment of the Senate, we will enforce it all the time, though it is clearly against law. But I do not care.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order made by the Senator from New York. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. Those who are in favor will say "ay." [Putting the question.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the question is now being put to the Senate, the Senate is not dividing, and I move a recess to take place from five minutes to six o'clock to eight o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. I insist on a division of the Senate and the execution of the order of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now dividing on the question. The Chair is putting the question at the instance of the Senator from California on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would a motion to adjourn be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not while we are dividing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair was putting the question by a viva voce vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was putting the question by a viva voce vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that a division when we vote viva voce?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was a division. The question is on the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, there were on a division ayes 28.

Several SENATORS. "Given up."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The ayes have it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did a quorum vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection was raised.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I raise the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator states that he raises an objection. The Chair will count the negative side. Those opposed will rise.

Eight Senators rose in the negative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Twenty-eight in the affirmative and eight in the negative. The ayes have it.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at six o'clock and two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 10, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the resolution of the Senate to print four thousand copies of the report of the Special Committee to Investigate the Late Elections in Mississippi.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 1021) allowing the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails in their new iron steamships, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. JONES of Nevada, Mr. DAWES, and Mr. KEY.

PROTECTION OF RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE.

Mr. LORD. I ask unanimous consent to have a resolution read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the right of suffrage prescribed by the constitutions of the several States is subject to the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which is as follows:

"ARTICLE XV.

"SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

and whereas the exercise of the right of suffrage so prescribed and regulated should be faithfully maintained and observed by the United States and the several States and the citizens thereof; and whereas it is asserted that the exercise of the right of suffrage is in some of the States, notwithstanding the efforts of all good citizens to the contrary, resisted and controlled by fraud, intimidation, and violence, so that in such cases the object of the amendment is defeated; and whereas all citizens, without distinction of race, or class, or color, are entitled to the protection conferred by such article: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That all attempts by force, fraud, terror, intimidation, or otherwise to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage in any State should meet with certain, condign, and effectual punishment, and that in any case which has heretofore occurred or that may hereafter occur in which violence or murder has been or shall be committed by one race or class upon the other, the prompt prosecution and punishment of the criminal or criminals in any court having jurisdiction is imperatively demanded, whether the crime be one punishable by fine or imprisonment or one demanding the penalty of death.

Mr. LORD. I move the adoption of that resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I second the motion.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the resolution.

Mr. BEEBE. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

Mr. LORD. I understand the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is willing to withdraw his objection to the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to have the resolution read again.

The preamble and resolution were again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution at this time?

Mr. REAGAN. I simply want to say that, as I understand, the preamble affirms a condition of things the existence of which may be controverted. If so, I do not want to vote to affirm a state of facts of which we have no knowledge.

Mr. LORD. The preamble merely declares that "it is asserted that the exercise of the right of suffrage is resisted," &c.

Mr. COX. I suggest to my colleague [Mr. LORD] that he strike out the preamble. We should allow the States to take care of this mischief, which is local.

Mr. LORD. This proposition has been submitted to a great many gentlemen from the South, among them the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] who, though he thought no resolution necessary, suggested the first part as to the fifteenth amendment. The whole preamble was added, save one clause, to satisfy southern members. The resolution simply states the provision of the Constitution just as it is, and asserts that in the North and the South alike there should be protection for the free exercise of the right of suffrage under that constitutional provision, of course by the States, unless a State or States should refuse, when further legislation would be necessary. I think the resolution should be adopted unanimously.

Several MEMBERS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLYMER. My judgment is that this ought to go to a committee.

Mr. LORD. I demand the previous question, and shall call the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CLYMER. Pending that I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The demand for the previous question takes precedence.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 83, noes 53; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LORD and Mr. CLYMER were appointed.

Mr. BLAND. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The preamble and resolution were again read.

Mr. BLAND. I think that this proposition ought to be discussed.

Mr. CLYMER. Is it possible to vote separately upon the preamble and the resolution?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is now dividing.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 19; no quorum voting.

Mr. BLAND. I call for a further count.

Mr. HOAR. I make the point of order that the objection that there is no quorum can only be made by a gentleman rising in his seat.

Mr. BLAND. Well, I rise in my seat and make the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is very well taken, and if uniformly enforced would save the Chair infinite trouble. Gentlemen frequently complain that they have not been recognized, when the difficulty is that they have not arisen from their seats. If a gentleman rises in his seat to address the Chair, the Chair is very likely to see him. The point is made that no quorum has voted upon the count by tellers.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move a call of the House.

Mr. HOAR. My point of order is that the objection of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] should be taken by him rising in his seat, so that it may be recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been so done.

Mr. BLAND. I believe I rose in my seat to object. I simply desire that the previous question may be voted down and that we may have some discussion upon a resolution of this importance. I do not say that I will vote against the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The matter is not subject to discussion now.

Mr. CLYMER. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. KASSON. Is there any motion in order except to move that there be a call of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is in order, or a demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KASSON. But not on seconding the demand for the previous question. Consequently I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct, only two motions are in order, to adjourn and that there be a call of the House.

Mr. CLYMER. I rise to a question of order, and it is that my motion to refer was made before the gentleman from New York demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order pending the demand for the previous question, and the gentleman from Iowa declines to yield for that purpose.

Mr. KASSON. I ask for a vote on my motion that there be a call of the House.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to make a suggestion. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] says he desires discussion on the resolution and does not know whether he will vote against it or not. I suggest to the gentleman from New York to agree by unanimous consent there shall be discussion on the resolution for half an hour.

Mr. EDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair always entertains such a proposition.

Mr. EDEN. I object to debate and demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would be glad to entertain any proposition, but objection is made and there is a demand for the regular order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that there be a call of the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 46.

So the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Bass, Bell, Blackburn, Bliss, Blount, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Candler, Cason, Caulfield, Chapin, Chittenden, Collins, Cowan, Crapo, Culberson, De Bolt, Denison, Dobbins, Dunnell, Ellis, Ely, Faulkner, Fuller, Gause, Gibson, Glover, Goode, Goodin, Robert Hamilton, Haralson, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hartridge, Hatcher, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Hill, Hoge, Holman, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Jenks, Frank Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, King, Lamar, George M. Landers, Lane, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Mackey, Maish, Meade, Milliken, Money, Neal, O'Brien, Oliver, O'Neil, Phelps, John F. Philips, Plaisted, Platt, Powell, Purman, Randall, James B. Reilly, Sobieski Ross, Scales, Schumaker, Seelye, Smalls, Southard, Sparks, Stowell, Swann, Teese, Martin I. Townsend, Tucker, Waldron, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Wash, Ward, Warren, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wike, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, Benjaman Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodworth, and Young.

Mr. FELTON. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. HARTRIDGE, is sick in bed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not time to offer excuses.

ARTIFICIAL LIMBS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, by unanimous consent, will announce the managers of the conference on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1516) to regulate the issue of artificial limbs to disabled soldiers, seaman, and others, as follows: Mr. RUSK, Mr. RICE, and Mr. BAGBY.

PROTECTION OF RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, how many members have answered to their names?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and seventy-three.

Mr. KASSON. That is more than a quorum; and therefore I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I now ask that the tellers take their places.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers will resume their places; and the question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The tellers resumed their places; and the House again divided.

Mr. HALE. I notice my amiable friend from New York [Mr. COX] is present and not voting.

Mr. COX. That side does not run the House altogether. I wish to say to my friend that I am ready to vote on this resolution——

Mr. CONGER. I object to debate.

Mr. COX. Why do you not close up your own side?

Mr. HALE rose, and his remarks were rendered inaudible to the reporter by the beating of the Speaker's gavel.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine is entirely out of order.

Mr. COX. I do not vote at the dictation of the other side.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must insist on order in the Hall.

Mr. COX. When gentlemen are called to order, are they not compelled to be seated?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are requested to take their seats, and the gentleman from Maine will be kind enough to resume his seat.

Mr. HALE. If the Chair will be kind enough, I will say that I have known the question raised before, and that is the reason why I raised it now.

Mr. EDEN. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is out of order himself.

Mr. EDEN. Have I not a right to make a point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. You have, but only from your own seat. The Chair has requested gentlemen to take their seats.

On the question of seconding the demand for the previous question, the tellers report—ayes 90, noes 21.

Several MEMBERS. No quorum.

Mr. KASSON. Let gentlemen who make the point that there is no quorum rise from their seats.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise in my place and make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. KASSON. Then nothing is left but again to move a call of the House, if gentlemen on that side will not vote.

Mr. YEATES. They are following your example of the other day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] moves a call of the House.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 85, noes 30.

So a call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Speaker——

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. LORD. I ask unanimous consent that I may make a very brief statement in regard to this resolution.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object.

Mr. KASSON. There is no objection to that from this side of the House.

Mr. LORD. I want to call the attention of the House for a moment to what I consider a grave misapprehension in regard to this resolution. I therefore ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement.

Mr. HEREFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia objects to debate.

Mr. LORD. Allow me only one word of explanation.

Mr. HEREFORD. We do not want any explanation.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the demand for the previous question will be withdrawn so that discussion may be allowed.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. I am satisfied there will be no opposition to this resolution if it is understood.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must insist on gentlemen preserving order. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Bell, Blackburn, Bliss, Blount, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Candler, Cason, Caulfield, Chapin, Chittenden, Collins, Cowan, Crapo, Culberson, Darrall, De Bolt, Denison, Dobbins, Douglas, Dunnell, Ellis, Ely, Gibson, Glover, Goode, Goodin, Robert Hamilton, Haralson, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hartridge, Hatcher, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Hill, Hoge, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hunter, Jenks, Frank Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, Knott, Lamar, George M. Landers, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Mackey, Meade, Milliken, Money, Neal, O'Brien, Oliver, O'Neill, Phelps, John F. Philips, Plaisted, Platt, Powell, Purman, Randall, Sobieski Ross, Schumaker, Seelye, Smalls, Southard, Sparks, Stowell, Swann, Teese, Martin I. Townsend, Tucker, Waldron, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Walsh, Ward, Warren, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Wike, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodworth, and Young.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call of the roll shows that one hundred and seventy-eight members are present. What is the pleasure of the House?

Mr. SAVAGE. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. And I hope this side of the House will stop this filibustering and let us get a vote.

Mr. ATKINS. This side of the House is not filibustering. The gentleman is mistaken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.) Debate is not in order.

Mr. KASSON. There was a remark made which was not heard here. Was it not that gentlemen on the other side are not voting?

Mr. EDEN. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. EDEN. Then I object to debate.

Mr. COX. Is the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. COX. I would like to say that this side of the House is ready to vote for the resolution. It is a little demagogical, but we will vote for it.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. COX. Let us come to a vote on the resolution.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SAVAGE to dispense with further proceedings under the call, it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question on the resolution submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LORD;] on which question tellers were ordered.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to make an excuse for an absent member. My colleague from Illinois, Mr. CAULFIELD, is detained from the House on account of sickness.

Mr. MCCRARY. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman on a question of order.

Mr. MCCRARY. Before the House divides, I ask that Rule 31 be read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read Rule 31.

The Clerk read as follows:

31. Every member who shall be in the House when the question is put shall give his vote, unless the House shall excuse him. All motions to excuse a member from voting shall be made before the House divides, or before the call of the yeas and nays is commenced; and the question shall then be taken without debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the point of order of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. MCCRARY. I desired to have the rule read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule has been read.

Mr. MCCRARY. That is all I desired.

The question recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] has had the rule read in relation to this matter for a purpose and I think the order ought to be enforced. My point of order is that the gentlemen upon the other side of the House shall be required to vote as well as gentlemen upon this side. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot require members on either side of the House to vote.

Mr. CONGER. Before the Chair decides the point of order——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to speak to the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is not in order.

[Renewed cries of "Regular order!"]

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LORD and Mr. CLYMER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 133, noes 18.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The question recurred on the preamble and resolution.

Mr. KASSON. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask a division of the vote on the preamble and resolution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will not the question be first upon agreeing to the resolution and then upon the preamble?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly the question must first be taken upon the resolution and then the preamble.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire whether in a case where the preamble and resolution are so intimately connected that the resolution will have no sense and will be ungrammatical if the preamble be stricken out a demand for a division is in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands this question to be divisible.

Mr. COX. Will the House vote first upon the resolution or upon the preamble?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will vote first upon the resolution and then upon the preamble.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That all attempts by force, fraud, terror, intimidation, or otherwise to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage in any State should meet with certain, condign, and effectual punishment, and that in any case which has heretofore occurred or that may hereafter occur in which violence or murder has been or shall be committed by one race or class upon the other, the prompt prosecution and punishment of the criminal or criminals in any court having jurisdiction is imperatively demanded, whether the crime be one punishable by fine or imprisonment or one demanding the penalty of death.

Mr. COX. I ask my colleague from New York [Mr. LORD] to allow me to offer an amendment in the nature of a proviso to the resolution.

Mr. KASSON and Mr. CONGER objected.

Mr. COX. I shall vote for the resolution as it stands, but I prefer to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. CONGER. I object to debate.

The question was taken on agreeing to the resolution; and there were—yeas 174, nays 2, not voting 109; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Beebe, Blair, Boone, Bradford, Bradley, Bright, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, Cannon, Caswell, Cate, John B. So the resolution was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. My colleague, Mr. WALLING, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. FELTON. My colleague, Mr. HARTRIDGE, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. WILLIS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. LEAVENWORTH, but I voted "ay," because Mr. LEAVENWORTH if present would have voted "ay." I desire further to state that my colleague, Mr. BLISS, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. My colleague, Mr. YOUNG, is detained at his room by sickness.

Mr. SPENCER. My colleagues, Mr. GIBSON and Mr. ELLIS, are absent. If present they would vote "ay."

Mr. CONGER. My colleagues, Mr. WALDRON and Mr. HUBBELL, are absent by leave of the House. If present they would vote "ay."

Mr. STRAIT. My colleague, Mr. DUNNELL, is absent by leave of the House. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. MACDOUGALL. My colleague, Mr. ADAMS, is necessarily absent from the House. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. STEVENSON. My colleague, Mr. CAMPBELL, is absent by leave of the House. If present he would "ay."

Mr. HARTZELL. My colleague, Mr. SPARKS, is absent by leave of the House. If present he would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. LORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred upon adopting the preamble.

Mr. BANKS. I make the point of order that the previous question has not been ordered upon the preamble.

Mr. HOAR. The previous question was ordered upon the whole subject.

Mr. BANKS. That cannot be under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the previous question was ordered upon the preamble and the resolution.

Mr. KASSON. And the yeas and nays were ordered on both; and after they were ordered a division of the question was demanded.

Mr. BANKS. The preamble is open to amendment until the resolution has been disposed of. The previous question, which has been ordered, cannot apply to this preamble, and it is at this moment open to amendment.

Mr. BLAND. I move to lay the preamble on the table.

Mr. BANKS. The rule is explicit upon the point I have stated.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague cites in regard to this preamble the practice of the House in reference to the title of a bill. It never has been held in this House when the previous question was ordered on an entire matter, and had been partly executed, some one having demanded a division of the question, that the previous question did not apply to the rest of the subject, in this case to the preamble.

Mr. GARFIELD. The point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] applies only to the title of a bill, and not to the preamble of a resolution. This is a resolution with a preamble, and the previous question was ordered upon the whole subject. The fact that it is a divisible proposition does not make any difference as to the point whether the previous question ordered by the House covers the whole matter. However, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] has moved to lay the preamble on the table.

Mr. BANKS. The statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is not correct, because the rule of the House relates specifically to a resolution, and declares that the adoption of the previous question does not cover the preamble of the resolution. I will read if the gentleman desires it. It will be found on page 164 of the Digest and is as follows:

The preamble is not covered by the previous question ordered upon the passage of the resolution, but is itself subject to a separate demand of the previous question.

I make the point at this time, because it is impossible for the House by ordering the previous question upon the resolution to deprive itself of the power of amending the preamble, until the question upon the resolution has been decided.

Mr. KASSON. I will ask the Clerk to read the record of the motion submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] in reference to the previous question.

Mr. COX. I believe debate is not in order pending the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. BLAND. I withdraw that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to lay on the table was not entertained by the Chair, because at the time the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] had the floor upon a point of order.

Mr. BANKS. I do not care about the point of order particularly, and will withdraw it.

Mr. COX. I ask the Chair, whether or not a separate vote can be had upon the different whereases in this bill?

Mr. KASSON. I want the point of order decided, and I ask that the Clerk read the record of the call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read from the journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LORD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution, and moved the previous question on the adoption of the same, to wit.

Mr. KASSON. That covers the whole.

The Clerk continued to read as follows:

And the question was put, Will the House second the demand for the previous question?

When no quorum voted.

Then, on motion of Mr. KASSON,

Ordered, That there be a call of the House.

And the roll having been called, the following-named members failed to answer to their names.

Mr. KASSON. That is not important.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Chair will see that in distinct terms the previous question was ordered on the preamble and resolution, or, in the words of the Journal, "on the same."

Mr. MCCRARY. I think the point of order of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] was made too late. The time to have made that point was when the previous question was called on the preamble and resolution.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order at this time to make a parliamentary inquiry, pertinent to this matter?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would.

Mr. COX. My inquiry is whether the question upon these various whereases in the preamble is divisible?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. COX. The reason I ask that is——

Mr. CONGER. I object to debate.

Mr. MILLS. Is an amendment to this preamble now in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. The Chair will decide the point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] having moved, as appears by the record, the previous question upon the preamble and resolution, the previous question applies to both propositions. If he had demanded the previous question on the resolution alone, then the previous question would have applied only to that. The House, however, has ordered the main question to be now put upon both the preamble and resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the preamble.

Mr. COX. I call for a division of the question, so that a separate vote may be taken on each clause of the preamble.

The preamble was again read, as follows:

Whereas the right of suffrage prescribed by the constitutions of the several States is subject to the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which is as follows:

"ARTICLE XV.

"SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

and whereas the exercise of the right of suffrage so prescribed and regulated should be faithfully maintained and observed by the United States and the several States and the citizens thereof; and whereas it is asserted that the exercise of the right of suffrage is in some of the States, notwithstanding the efforts of all good citizens to the contrary, resisted and controlled by fraud, intimidation, and violence, so that in such cases the object of the amendment is defeated; and whereas all citizens without distinction of race, or class, or color are entitled to the protection conferred by such article: Therefore.

Mr. COX. I had proposed to ask a division so as to have a separate vote on that part of the preamble which makes an assertion of certain facts, because that assertion is not considered as absolutely true. But I withdraw that call for a division.

Mr. LORD. The preamble makes no affirmation of facts; it merely declares that "it is asserted," &c.

Several members objected to debate.

The question was taken on agreeing to the preamble; and there were—yeas 125, nays 31, not voting 129; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Blair, Boone, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. So the preamble was adopted.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. HEREFORD. My colleague, Mr. FAULKNER, is quite sick today, and is therefore absent.

Mr. HOUSE. My colleague, Mr. YOUNG, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. WILLIS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. LEAVENWORTH. If he were here he would vote as I have done, "ay." My colleague, Mr. BLISS, is absent by order of the House. If here he would vote "ay."

Mr. STENGER. My colleague, Mr. JENKS, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. SCALES. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. SEELYE. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. FOSTER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WALLING. I presume that if he were present he would vote "ay," as I have.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. LORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIM OF TILTON, WHEELWRIGHT & CO.

Mr. BEEBE. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department. The committee have directed me to report the testimony taken by them, together with the report of the majority and the views of the minority, with reference thereto. I ask for the reading of the resolutions appended to the report of the majority.

Mr. HALE. I rise to make a point of order. I presume that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] introduces this report claiming that it comes under the resolution which was adopted on Monday last. My point is that it does not come under that resolution and is not embraced in it.

I do not know whether the present occupant of the chair [Mr. SPRINGER in the chair] was present and appreciated the whole force of the rule adopted on last Monday. The object sought and attained by that rule, which was agreed upon, as will be remembered, after a day's filibustering, was that committees which had not reported (and I ask the attention of the Chair to this as a cardinal point) should be allowed to report. The Chair will remember that through the whole of that sometimes boisterous day especial significance was laid upon the importance of having both the majority and minority reports from a committee come in at the same time. Discussion upon that point swayed from one side to the other; largely between my friend from New York [Mr. COX] and myself. Finally, coming together as we did in a spirit of fairness, that rule was established.

And its object, Mr. Speaker, was that all committees which had not reported should be allowed to get their reports before the House and before the country on certain conditions. The report submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] does not in any regard come under the principles which were established by that resolution. His is a report which has been already presented, upon which subject a minority report has also been presented; and the two have been printed, gone to the country, and been recommitted to the committee not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider. This case was not affected, I claim, by the rule that we adopted; and, to show that, I call the attention of the Chair to a part of the colloquy which took place on that day.

The point had come up as to when the rule established should apply. Here is the RECORD:

Mr. HALE. Then let it be understood that this agreement is prospective, not retrospective.

Mr. SPRINGER—

The present incumbent of the chair—

And also that where the majority and the minority of a committee are now ready to report they can report at any time?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. YEATES. The arrangement to date from this day.

Mr. HALE. From this day.

Mr. BEEBE—

Raising then the question raised now—

How will that arrangement affect the cases where the majority and the minority reports have been printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider? Could not those committees report at any time, the minority being ready?

Mr. YEATES. They have already reported.

Showing what the view was then, that these were outside of the scope of the resolution.

Mr. WAIT. I cannot see the embarrassment the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] speaks of. If the majority and the minority are both ready to report, then they can report at any time.

Below on the same page, after the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] read the proposition as agreed to, I find this:

Mr. HALE. That is a fair proposition, and unless that can be agreed to there is no use in talking any further about it.

The proposition stated to be fair is this:

"Resolved, That the investigating committees may have leave to report during the remainder of this session at any time after forty-eight hours from the time the committee have agreed to their report and submitted the same to the minority, who shall have leave at the same time to submit their views to the House; but if the minority is absent from the meeting of the committee then notice shall be given in the House itself."

Mr. BEEBE. Will there be objection to adding that in all cases where both the majority and minority are ready both reports may be made at any time?

Showing the gentleman himself wanted something more added to the rule to bring his committee in.

Mr. COX. Nobody will object to that.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I object to that with closed doors.

Mr. BEEBE. I put the question to my friend from Maine.

Mr. HALE. What is the question?

Mr. BEEBE. Is there objection where the majority and minority are both ready to their reporting at any time?

Showing again he did not consider his committee came in under the rule, but must come in, if at all, under the proposition that both the majority and minority are ready; then it could come in.

Mr. HALE. Of course there is no objection to that. This agreement does not apply to such a case as that.

And there, Mr. Speaker, the question was left, clearly showing at the time it was understood both by the House and, as I believe it must have been, by the Speaker that the rule as established was for the purpose of bringing in the reports of committees who had no opportunity of getting before the House and the country on forty-eight hours' notice. But in no regard did it apply to a case where a committee had got in and had its report printed and the views of the minority printed; and both reports were recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

As to the other proposition, the gentleman from New York suggested at that time whether the committee may report when both sides are ready and the question came up. I do not raise that now. I raise the point, and ask the ruling of the Chair on it, as to whether the agreement we made on Monday last does include committees which had already reported and their reports sent back, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider. I understand at the time that it did not. What I have read of the colloquy shows members so understand it. The gentleman from New York cannot have otherwise understood it, because he claimed they came in in another way. It was so left in the agreement submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] which was then adopted by the House, and it was understood it did not embrace such cases. It was an important agreement, and it must be construed strictly, as the lawyer in the chair must know.

Mr. BEEBE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine has stopped short of the resolution which was finally adopted as the result of the proceedings had on the occasion to which he has alluded. I did endeavor during the progress of the discussion to have it distinctly understood that the proposition should include those committees where reports have been submitted and recommitted with an order to be printed, not to be brought back, &c. I was struggling throughout for what I believe I obtained on that occasion: priority over committees where no reports had been made at all. I stated then that this committee had agreed upon their report. I stated that this minority report had been submitted here and had been printed by order of the House.

Now, sir, I claim, independently of the resolution adopted on that occasion, the intendment, the necessary construction of the language used during the discussion on that day, bears me out in the claim that I could have reported at any moment after that understanding had been reached; and, desiring to exercise abundant caution, I planted myself on the resolution which the gentleman has carefully refrained from reading.

I ask the clerk to read the resolution adopted as the final determination of the discussion had on Monday.

Mr. HALE. That is what I just read.

Mr. BEEBE. I did not hear the gentleman read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the investigation committees may have leave to report during the remainder of this session at any time after forty-eight hours' notice from the time the committee have agreed to the report and submitted the same to the minority, who shall have leave at the same time to submit their views to the House; and if the minority is absent from the meeting, said notice of the same shall be given in the House.

Mr. BEEBE. According to my recollection the gentleman from Maine did not read that resolution.

Mr. HALE. Why, yes; I did.

Mr. BEEBE. That is a matter of recollection, and it is not important.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that the resolution clearly authorizes all committees to report where there had been a submission of the views of the majority to the minority forty-eight hours before the report is sought or attempted to be introduced. My position was that without submitting anything to the minority in a case of this kind we had a right to report at any time. But the committee was called together. The gentleman who submits the views of the minority accepted notice then, and he will accept it now. He was notified more than forty-eight hours ago. And under any possible construction this committee is now authorized and entitled to report. I do not care to take up further time of the House in the discussion of a proposition which to me seems so clear and plain.

Mr. YEATES. As the gentleman from Maine has alluded to me, I wish to state what I consider to be the agreement that we entered into prior to the adoption of that resolution.

I understood, Mr. Speaker, from the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the objection raised on his side of the House was to any report being brought in here where the minority would not have the opportunity of being heard. And to prevent that, resort was had to calls of the House, by which considerable delay was occasioned. Finally, for the purpose of allowing the minority the opportunity to be heard, as he requested—and if you look back to the gentleman's remarks you will see he so stated it—the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] was offered and adopted, giving the minority the relief they sought. I said that certain reports had already been made, and the reason I said that was this: These reports having been made to the House, the minority reports being in as well as the majority reports, no advantage could be taken of the minority; and therefore they were not included in this agreement. That was what I meant, and I meant nothing else.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] distinctly stated that what he wanted was that the minority should have a fair chance of being heard, and that no report should be brought in here at the end of the session or at any time when the minority could not be heard; and I was willing to adopt his views on that subject, not believing it was the design of any one to prevent the minority of a committee being heard. The object was to give full guarantee that the minority should be heard; but where reports had been made, the majority making a report and the minority making a report, wherefore should we have any delay, both sides having been fully represented? I think that was the true meaning of the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] and that I think was the full understanding of the House in adopting it.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. YEATES. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HALE. Did the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. YEATES] realize, at that time, that what was wanted was that committees that had not got into the House should get in? Does he not bear in mind that those committees that had got in here had had their opportunity? They come in with their reports and have them printed and they go to the country, and then they themselves ask that the reports be recommitted, which is done on the customary order, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider. It was not those committees that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] or any gentleman, I take it, sought to get at by this resolution. Those committees had been in, had reported, had got their reports before the public. It was another class of committees we were wrangling about on Monday.

Mr. YEATES. I will answer the gentleman's question. I understood the whole point made upon this question to be that the minorities of committees that had not made reports should have an opportunity of being heard.

Mr. HALE. That was it.

Mr. YEATES. But I did not understand that it prevented a report being taken up that had already been made where the minority had been heard, for the gentleman said his object was not to prevent reports of committees or action upon them, but to protect minorities. That was the ground the gentleman took.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine whether he desires by this point of order to obstruct the reports of a majority and a minority of a committee coming in where there is perfect accord between the majority and the minority? If he does not mean that, what can he mean?

Mr. HALE. Let me tell the gentleman what I mean.

Mr. COX. In a moment. Now the gentleman disavowed that the other day. And our basis of agreement was precisely this: The only contest on that side of the House was that the minority should have sufficient notification. That was our agreement. We agreed, as the record shows, where the majority and minority did agree to report, whether the reports were recommitted or otherwise, no contest should be made.

Mr. HALE. Now let me answer the gentleman's question. I do not propose where the majority and minority of the committee have agreed upon a report outside of this resolution which was adopted on Monday and where they ask a consideration of their reports to object, but what I do object to is that the gentleman should attempt to bring in this report under that resolution; he can come in outside of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair then understands the gentleman from Maine to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. HALE. No, I insist on the point of order if the report be pressed under this resolution. I will not object to the introduction of the majority and minority reports where both parties have agreed that under this resolution the report of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman from New York desirous to report these resolutions independently of the resolution adopted on Monday last? The Chair need not decide on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Certainly, if the gentleman does not claim to report it under the resolution I will not press the point of order.

Mr. BEEBE. I claim the privilege to make this report under the resolution adopted on Monday last, which was clear and explicit. I claim that under the unwritten agreement of the House, as manifested by the discussion at the time, I had a right to report at any time. In witness of that fact I will call the attention of the House to what occurred on that occasion. I desire, inasmuch as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has reiterated the statement that he had no objection to the majority and minority reports being presented at the same time, I want to hold up the gentleman's own action upon that occasion as a mirror in which he can see his present action.

I call attention to the fact that when that committee made their report they asked it should be a special order by agreement, and that was objected to by the gentleman from Maine. In view of that objection the committee could do nothing more than that which he was willing to allow them to do, and that was to present their report and have it printed and recommitted to the committee, not to be brought back by motion to reconsider, as the parliamentary phrase is. Now, I wish the Chair to understand the committee claim the right to report these resolutions without reference to the resolution adopted on Monday last, and, further, they claim the right to report it under that resolution, the terms of which are too explicit to be disputed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is clear that under the rules of the House the gentleman has no right to submit a report from a standing committee of the House at this time; and if the gentleman from New York has a right to report now he derives that right from the order made by the House on Monday. That order has been read, and it is not necessary that the Chair should now read it again. That resolution unquestionably was intended to embody the sense of the House; and it is not necessary to consult the debates preceding its adoption, in order to construe it, unless its language is susceptible of two constructions or is of doubtful meaning. But this is not the case. The order, or resolution, provides that investigation committees may report at any time after forty-eight hours from the time the committee have agreed to report and submitted the same to the minority, and this committee having agreed upon their report have a right to report now. Then, if forty-eight hours' notice has been given to the minority that the majority report will be submitted to the House, of course they have a right to make the report. The Chair does not know what is the fact in reference to that matter.

Mr. BEEBE. I stated that to be the fact; and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BAKER,] who represents the minority of the committee, and myself are not at all at variance upon that question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That being the case, the Chair will overrule the point of order. The Chair does not know whether this report now submitted to the House has ever been submitted to the House before and been recommitted. It comes to the House now as the report of a committee under the new order of Monday last.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Chair allow the minority to speak on that point, as was done yesterday?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. This report was made from the 1st of August, and was ordered to be printed. We have submitted our report; and the only object, as I understand it, now on the part of the chairman is that at this time the two reports may be discussed. Now I have no ambition to engage in such a discussion. The reports were submitted to the House and ordered to be printed before the arrangement on Monday last was made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Chair understands that the report is in order, and the Clerk will read the resolution reported by the majority of the committee.

Mr. HALE. Where is the minority report? It should also be before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will first read the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee.

Mr. HALE. This is a matter cognate to what has engrossed a great deal of the time of the House, and I do not see that there is any need for further discussion upon it. It is proposed that the two reports shall go to the country together. I can if I choose call for the reading of both reports, which will take up the most of the day; but it seems to me that in the cases of other investigations, and notably so in the investigation into naval affairs and the real-estate pool and Jay Cooke & Co.'s indebtedness, of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] is chairman, their reports were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I think that this report should take the same reference.

Mr. BEEBE. This committee comes here with the majority report recommending positive action by the House, and it is the desire of the majority of that committee to get an expression of opinion from the House in reference to the several resolutions attached to the majority report. That was my object in requesting that the resolutions might be read. If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] desires to inform himself by having these reports read in full after they have been before this House for more than a week, and on file in the document-room, where he could have secured a copy at any time, it will not take forty minutes to read both reports. What I desire is action at this time upon the resolutions.

Mr. HALE. Do the minority of the committee submit a resolution?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the minority submit no resolution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think there is one thing which does not seem to be properly understood by the House relative to the right of a committee having leave to report at any time. There are various committees that can report at any time, notably these investigating committees and committees of conference, &c. But I do not understand that that gives those committees the unquestioned right to have their reports considered by the House at the time when submitted unless there is no other business before the House.

Now this House has under consideration at this time as unfinished business the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to reconsider the vote referring the President's message on the sundry civil appropriation bill to the Committee on Appropriations. On that unfinished business the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] had the floor yesterday and yielded to a motion to adjourn. Now there is no doubt at all about the right to enter a motion to reconsider or the right to report at any time of these investigating committees, or the right of a committee of conference to report even in the midst of other business before the House. But that other business must first be disposed of in some manner before the report of an investigating committee can be considered. If this motion to reconsider, which is now the unfinished business, was disposed of, then anybody could raise the question of consideration upon the report of an investigating committee. But the House adjourned on yesterday with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] on the floor, and he undoubtedly has now the right to finish his remarks on that question of high privilege, almost the highest known to the House, before the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] can demand consideration of his report. That is the point of order I make.

Mr. BEEBE. When a committee is authorized to report at any time, it is authorized to make its report for action and for consideration. Such is the universal, unvarying practice of this House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman refer to some instance of that kind?

Mr. BEEBE. When the Committee on Appropriations report a bill it is for action.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No; it is for reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BEEBE. The whole trouble rests here. This committee has recommended the removal of a high officer of this Government, and the other side of the House dare not face the music on the record made.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We do not know that; we have not heard the resolutions read yet.

Mr. HALE. I think the gentleman has no reason to say that this side of the House is afraid of any recommendations from the other side. There have been other recommendations made, and I do not think this side of the House has shown any fear to meet them.

Mr. HURLBUT. Is there any doubt in the mind of the Speaker as to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON?]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT.]

Mr. HURLBUT. I presume there can be no question about it. The business of the highest privilege now is the unfinished business of yesterday, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] is entitled to the floor on that business; there can be no question about that. I understand that he is now ready to take the floor.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It has been repeatedly decided by the Speaker that the unfinished business takes precedence of everything else.

Mr. BEEBE. I desire to state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] came to me this morning and spoke in reference to this matter. I stated to him that we desired action on this report, and that in my judgment, unless much time was desired by gentlemen on their side of the House, it would not involve any great length of time to enable the House to come to a conclusion upon it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. A single word. I do not rise for the purpose of antagonizing the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEEBE;] I never do that. I merely want it distinctly understood how we shall proceed with these highly privileged questions which we have so many of. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] desires to withdraw his claim to the floor at this time, I have no objection at all, and I am willing to vote on any resolution that may come before the House. But we must observe our rules of practice here, or we will get so badly mixed up as not to know what we are about.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to reconsider the vote by which the message of the President on the sundry civil appropriation bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BEEBE. That is not the pending question while I have the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Upon that question I am entitled to the floor. If I understand the rules of the House that motion to reconsider is a question of the highest privilege. If it be so and I am entitled to the floor, I desire now to take it and go on with my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will decide the point of order raised by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] having submitted a report which the Chair has held to be privileged, and the Clerk having proceeded to read or being about to proceed to read the resolutions accompanying the report without objection from any one, the Chair thinks the point of order comes too late.

If reference to the other question raised, however, the Chair will decide it upon its merits. The question of reconsideration is now remitted to the order of unfinished business; and as such the Chair does not understand that it takes precedence of a privileged question, such, for instance, as the right of a committee of conference to report at any time. This committee having claimed the right under the recent order of the House to report at any time, it is now in order to submit that report. If, however, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] had obtained the floor immediately after the reading of the journal and claimed the right to speak on the unfinished business, he could not have been taken from the floor, that being the business then in order. But the floor has been taken by another gentleman who has submitted a report, which the Chair thinks now in order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] is therefore entitled to the floor.

Mr. BEEBE. I ask that the resolution appended to the majority report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Isaiah Hanscom, chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy Department, is unworthy and incompetent to hold that position, and that the interests of the Bureau, the Department, and the Government require his removal.

Resolved, That by reason of the negligence of George M. Robeson, Secretary of the Navy, and his order to pay the firm of Tilton, Wheelwright & Co. the claim presented by them in January, 1874, the Government of the United States was defrauded by said Tilton, Wheelwright & Co. of the sum so paid, to wit, $32,019.10.

Resolved, That a copy of the annexed testimony, together with the reports of the majority and minority of the committee and of these resolutions, with notice of the action of the House of Representatives herein, be laid before the President of the United States by the Clerk of this House.

Mr. CONGER. This is a very important matter, affecting two citizens of the United States. I ask that before the House passes upon these resolutions the report be read.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And the views of the minority?

Mr. CONGER. I call for the reading of the majority report and the views of the minority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. BEEBE. I do not understand that this reading will come out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that any gentleman would have the right to call for the reading of a paper before he is required to vote upon it.

Mr. CONGER. I believe I am entitled to ask the reading before we consider it.

Mr. HALE. The Chair on a moment's reflection must see that the reports must first be read before there is any discussion of the question by any gentleman. It is the reports that come in here this morning; and they must be read before the House can be asked to consider them. The Chair, if he will refresh his recollection, must remember that reports are always read at once before any gentleman takes the floor. A report is not before the House until it is read, if any gentleman asks for the reading.

I beg to call the attention of the Chair to an illustration. Even in the case of an appropriation bill coming before the House, it is first read before the gentleman reporting it can submit his remarks. It is first read as a whole; then the speech-making comes in; and then the bill is read by clauses for amendment. The primary fundamental proceeding in the consideration of a report is the reading of that report.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair will pardon me for suggesting that the right given to a committee to report at any time is not a right to offer resolutions at any time but to present a report. It is a report that is to be submitted; and it must be read to the House if any gentleman desires it. I do not know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] has any choice—from what he has said I suppose he has not—as to whether the report shall be first read and his remarks he made afterward.

Mr. BEEBE. I have no objection to the reading of the report; but I do not think it should come out of my time.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair will pardon me for reminding him that the practice in regard to private bills reported from committees settles this question.

Mr. HALE. It is not claimed that the reading of the report will come out of the time of the gentleman from New York. Of course he will have his hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York to take the floor for the purpose of discussing this question; and the reading was called for afterward; but that question is waived by the statement of the gentleman from New York that he does not desire the floor now. Therefore as the reading of the reports has been called for, they will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the reports, but was interrupted by a

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEREFORD. As the message just received announces that the Senate has acted on the river and harbor bill, I desire at this time to present to the House the conference report on that subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not be in order now, as a paper is being read.

Mr. KASSON. O, yes, it will be.

Mr. HEREFORD. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] will consent that this matter shall be laid aside temporarily, I would like to have the conference report considered now.

Mr. KASSON. As a matter of order, I wish to say that under the rule and practice of the two Houses a gentleman calling up a conference report for action can even take a member who is speaking off his feet.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understand the rule to be (and it has a close connection with the point I raised a few moments ago) that a gentleman may be taken off his feet by the presentation of a conference report; but it is for the House to determine whether that report shall be considered or not. This is of the highest privilege, and can be made at any time, so as to let us know it is there if we want it; but we are not compelled to consider that or anything else.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I presume the gentleman will not have objection to have this report considered.

Mr. BEEBE. There is no objection, so far as I know, to having a vote taken on the conference report, provided it is understood we only waive for that purpose.

Mr. RUSK. You do not waive anything. That is the rule.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEREFORD. I rise to submit a privileged report, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read, and on its adoption I demand the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 4, 6, 12, 35, 46, 78, 102, 110, 128.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 43, 45, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 76, 77, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 103, 104, 106, 107, 108, 109, 111, 112, 114, 115, 117, 118, 120, 121, 124, 125, 126, 127, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 149, 150, 151, 152, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 162, and 164; and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 5, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: Insert "three" in lieu of "five;" and the House agree thereto.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted insert the words "and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 13, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: Insert "five" in lieu of "ten;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 42, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted insert "and thirty-two;" and after the word "thousand," in line 1, page 6 of the bill, insert "five hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 44, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: Insert "fifteen" in lieu of "twenty-five;" and the House agree thereto.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 56, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: Insert "thirteen" in lieu of "thirty;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Insert "thirty-eight" in lieu of "forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 75, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 85, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "sixty-six" and insert "fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 93, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "three thousand" insert "twenty-five hundred;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 101, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "three thousand nine hundred and sixty," insert "thirty-five thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 165 and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Insert "one hundred and forty-two" in lieu of "one hundred and fifty:" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 113, and agree to the clause proposed to be sticken out, with the following amendment: In lieu of "50,000" insert "29,600;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 116, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "50" insert "30;" and the Senate agree thereto.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 119, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of "seven" insert "five;" and the House agree thereto.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 122, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: Insert "five" in lieu of "ten;" and the House agree thereto.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 123, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: Insert "five" in lieu of "eight;" and the House agree thereto.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 134, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: Insert "five" in lieu of "eight;" and the House agree thereto.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 148, and agree to the same, with the following amendment: In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted insert as follows: "Provided, That $10,000 thereof shall be expended for removing the bar at Fort Smith, Arkansas; And provided further, That $40,000 of the above sum shall be expended on the Missouri River, including improvements opposite Saint Joseph, Missouri, and at Nebraska City;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 153, and agree to the same, with the following amendment: Strike out "200," in line 22, page 15, and insert in lieu thereof "175;" and the Senate agree thereto.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 160, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Insert "72" in lieu of "75;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 161, and agree to the same, with the following amendments: Insert after the word "water" the words "at mean tide," and after the word "rivers" the words "to the port of New Orleans;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 163, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "therefore," in line 18 of said amendment, the following: "Not to exceed $10,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

FRANK HEREFORD,
JOHN H. REAGAN,
OMAR D. CONGER,
Managers on the part of the House.

WM. B. ALLISON,
A. A. SARGENT,
M. W. RANSOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIS. I call for the reading of the bill, which has never been reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question on agreeing to the report of the conference committee, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] calls for the reading of the bill.

Mr. WILLIS. I want to know what I am to vote upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the reading of the bill is not privileged at this time. The only matter of privilege is the reading of the report on which the gentleman is to vote.

Mr. WILLIS. I move to lay the report of the committee of conference on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order, and I ask the attention of the Chair as it is a question of order of some importance. My point of order is that it is not in order to move to lay a conference report on the table. The respect and courtesy between the two branches forbid it. The Chair will do me the favor before he looks at the Manual to listen to what I say. The only parliamentary motion is a motion to postpone the time of considering the report; but the report can be made, as has been already stated, even pending a motion to adjourn, while a member is on his feet, or pending a motion for a call of the House. It is of the very highest privilege.

Now, in the Congress before the last a question arose as to a statement by Mr. Barclay in the Digest to the effect that a motion to lay a conference report on the table is in order. The then Speaker, [Mr. Blaine,] believing that was a very important point and that it was wrongly stated in the Digest, called the attention of the House to it and desired some member to make a motion, so that the matter might be formally settled. I made the motion at the request of the Speaker. Thereupon my honorable colleague, who had been formerly Speaker of the House, [Mr. BANKS,] rose and stated the motion was out of order. The Chair sustained the point of order, and the House on appeal from the decision of the Speaker unanimously confirmed the decision, and that has been the rule ever since. What I have stated will appear by a reference to the Globe for the Congress before the last.

The Chair will see that one reason for this rule is that the order to lay a bill on the table is never communicated to the other branch, and courtesy would require us to communicate to the other branch our disposal of the report of a conference committee; an order to lay on the table being practically though not technically a final disposition of the matter; in this House it is practically so, being an indefinite postponement.

Mr. HEREFORD. I insist upon my motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] still has the floor on the point of order.

Mr. HOAR. I only desire further to say that I am opposed to this bill, and do not make the suggestion in the interest of the bill but in the interest of a very important parliamentary principle.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to a question of order. The motion of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] was a demand for the previous question. He did not surrender the floor—and I made the objection when the gentleman from Massachusetts rose—he did not surrender the floor for the motion to lay the report upon the table. It is therefore not before the House.

Mr. BANKS. I rose a few moments ago to make a remark which my colleague [Mr. HOAR] has made before I obtained the floor. I wished to state the reason for this rule. This being a question of courtesy between the two Houses, a conference report must be disposed of before any other business is determined, and our action must be communicated to the Senate. Now, when a bill is laid upon the table it can never be reached again. Any proposition laid upon the table in this House can never be again reached.

Mr. HEREFORD. I insist on the call for the previous question.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Have we not the right to demand the reading of each section of the bill to which an amendment is proposed by the conference committee to know what the amendment is?

Mr. HEREFORD. The bill is not before the House. It is only the conference report which is before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will rule on one point of order at a time. The point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will be first considered; and if gentlemen desire to address themselves to that point of order the Chair will be glad to hear them. That point is whether a motion to lay the conference report on the table is now in order.

Mr. HEREFORD. I claim that I had the floor and demanded the previous question. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] did not have the floor for the purpose of moving to lay the report upon the table.

Mr. WILLIS. I had the floor to make that motion.

Mr. HEREFORD. I made a demand for the previous question, and on that I insist.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] would be entitled to take the floor to make that motion to lay on the table if that motion were in order at that time, or any other motion that is in order. But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] raises the point of order that it is not in order to move to lay the report on the table. If gentlemen desire to address themselves to that question the Chair will be glad to hear them.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to say a word on the point of order. The principal point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is that laying the report on the table is a finality; that if the House lays the conference report on the table that motion takes the bill with it, and we cannot reach it again. Now, sir, we have a method by which we can reach it. Suppose this House wants to take time to consider this report, the report may be laid upon the table and a motion to reconsider filed. That will bring the matter before the House whenever called up as a question of the very highest privilege. Now, I concede that if the conference report were laid on the table without the entering of a motion to reconsider, that action would be discourteous to the Senate. But I maintain also that if the convenience of the House requires that time should be gained for the purpose of investigating the amendments reported by a conference committee, then it is competent to table the report and to enter a motion to reconsider, which can be called up when the convenience of the House permits it.

Mr. WILLIS. Perhaps the Chair may already have before him a reference to the clause of the Digest on page 82, under the head of conference committees, "the report may be laid on the table."

Mr. REAGAN. There is one point which I desire to raise. The chairman of the committee of conference had taken the floor and had presented his report and called for the previous question upon it, as he was entitled to demand it, and when that motion was made he was entitled to have it disposed of before any one else took the floor to make another motion, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] made his motion to lay the report upon the table from his seat and without special recognition by the Speaker.

Mr. WILLIS. I was recognized.

Mr. REAGAN. My colleague on the committee [Mr. HEREFORD] was recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has ruled upon that question, overruling the point of order. The Chair now desires to ask a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. REAGAN. May I ask this question in reference to the point of order which I raised? Did I understand the Speaker to decide that when a member has called the previous question he can be taken off the floor by any member in order to enable that member to make a motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to lay upon the table takes precedence of a call for the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. I concede that, if the other member has authority to make a motion, but the point with me is whether he can supersede another member in order to make a motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When a gentleman submits a motion for the previous question for the consideration of the House, he yields the floor, and then any other gentleman can take the floor and submit another motion which is in order at the time.

Mr. HEREFORD. Do I understand the Speaker to rule that I lost the floor when I moved the previous question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes, sir; the gentleman was not entitled to the floor after he demanded the previous question. After reporting from the committee of conference and moving the previous question upon agreeing to that report, he had no further right to the floor.

The Chair now desires to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] whether the ruling in the Digest, to which he has referred, was not overruled at a subsequent time?

Mr. HOAR. This ruling was read to the House by the Speaker at that time, and he stated that he desired to call the attention of the House to the fact that the authority in Barclay's Digest was otherwise, and thereupon, after considerable discussion, the House unanimously sustained the Chair, and held that a motion to lay a report of a committee of conference on the table was not in order. The matter was discussed by many of the most distinguished members of the House, and especially by my distinguished colleague from the fifth district, [Mr. BANKS,] who argued that a motion to lay a report from a committee of conference on the table would be an act of discourtesy to the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature; and therefore the House authoritatively overruled such a motion.

Mr. WILLIS. I submit that the unwritten law of the House is no more binding upon it than our written law when it depends upon the memory of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will decide the point of order. Under the rule of the House as it stands, stating what is the priority of motions, namely, first a motion to adjourn, then a motion to lay on the table, and then the previous question—under that rule it would be in order to move to lay any report or proposition pending before the House on the table previous to taking the vote upon the main question; but the Chair is informed that the uniform usage of the House has been not to entertain a motion to lay on the table a report of a committee of conference, it being discourteous to the other House to dispose of it in that manner, and in pursuance to the usages of the House the Chair rules that the motion to lay upon the table is not in order. This point was settled by the House on appeal from the decision of the Chair on the 8th of June, 1872. (See Congressional Globe, second session Forty-second Congress, page 4460.)

Mr. WILLIS. I now call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. HEREFORD. The report only is before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only question before the House is, Will the House agree to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the river and harbor bill?

Mr. WILLIS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and that is whether or not the members of this House will have an opportunity before they are called upon to vote on the passage of this bill to know what its contents are; and, if so, when?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a matter within the control of the House, and not of the Chair.

The question was put on seconding the demand for the previous question; and on a division there were—ayes 95, noes 35.

Mr. WILLIS. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that no quorum voted.

No quorum having voted, tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEREFORD and Mr. WILLIS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 105, noes 43.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred on ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question is voted down will it not be in order to recommit this report to the committee of conference?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be in order if the previous question is not ordered.

Mr. WHITE. Then I hope it will be voted down.

The question was taken upon ordering the main question; and on a division there were—ayes 99, noes 35.

Mr. RICE. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair then will appoint tellers; and Mr. RUSK and Mr. HEREFORD will act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 106, noes 29.

Mr. WILLIS. No quorum has voted, and I demand a further count.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be had by calling the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman from West Virginia will agree that we shall have a vote by yeas and nays upon the adoption of the report of the committee, I will not insist upon a further count.

Mr. HEREFORD. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman should have the yeas and nays.

No further count being insisted upon, the main question was ordered.

The question recurred on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HURLBUT. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRISON. I had intended to make some remarks upon this bill, but will not detain the House at this time to do so. I ask unanimous consent that they may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WHITE. I ask unanimous consent also to print some remarks upon this bill.

Mr. WIGGINTON. I make the same request.

Mr. MAGOON. I ask the same privilege.

There was no objection, and leave was accordingly granted to the above members to print remarks in the RECORD upon the river and harbor appropriation bill. [See Appendix.]

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference; and there were—yeas 104, nays 55, not voting 126; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Bradford, Bradley, Bright, Burleigh, John H. Caldwell, Cason, Caswell, Cate, Conger, Cook, Crounse, Davy, Dibrell, Durand, Durham, Eames, Egbert, Evans, Felton, Finley, Forney, Foster, Franklin, Freeman, Garfield, Gunter, Hale, Andrew H. Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Hartzell, Haymond, Henderson, Hereford, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, House, Hunton, Hurd, Hyman, Kasson, Kehr, Kimball, King, Franklin Landers, Lane, Lawrence, Levy, Lewis, Lynde, Magoon, MacDougall, McCrary, McDill, Monroe, New, Norton, Page, Payne, William A. Smith, Spencer, Strait, Stone, Tarbox, Thomas, Thornburgh, Throckmorton, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Waddell, Whiting, Willard, Alpheus S. Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Yeates—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, John H. Baker, Beebe, Bland, Boone, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Cabell, Cannon, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cutler, Davis, Eden, Fort, Frye, Goodin, Hardenbergh, Hoar, Hurlbut, Thomas L. Jones, Lapham, Luttrell, Lynch, Maish, McMahon, Meade, Morgan, Mutchler, Odell, Packer, Poppleton, Powell, Rainey, Randall, Rice, Robinson, Savage, Scales, Singleton, Sinnickson, Springer, Stenger, Stevenson, Terry, Thompson, Turney, Wait, G. Wiley Wells, White, Wigginton, James Williams, and Willis—55.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, George A. Bagley, Bass, Bell, Blackburn, Blair, Bliss, Blount, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Candler, Caulfield, Chapin, Chittenden, Cochrane, Collins, Cowan, Cox, Crapo, Culberson, Danford, Darrall, De Bolt, Denison, Dobbins, Douglas, Dunnell, Ellis, Ely, Faulkner, Fuller, Gause, Gibson, Glover, Goode, Robert Hamilton, Haralson, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hartridge, Hatcher, Hathorn, Hays, Hendee, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Hill, Hoge, Holman, Hooker, Hopkins, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hunter, Jenks, Frank Jones, Joyce, Kelley, Knott, Lamar, George M. Landers, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Lord, Mackey, McFarland, Metcalfe, Miller, Milliken, Mills, Money, Morrison, Nash, Neal, O'Brien, Oliver, O'Neill, Phelps, John F. Philips, Plaisted, Platt, Pratt, Purman, Roberts, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Sayler, Schumaker, Seelye, Smalls, Southard, Sparks, Stowell, Swann, Teese, Martin I. Townsend, Tucker, Waldron, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, John W Wallace, Walling, Walsh, Ward, Warren, Erastus Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wike, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James D. Williams, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodburn, Woodworth, and Young—126.

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. EDEN. My colleague, Mr. CAULFIELD, is detained from the House by illness.

Mr. WOODBURN. On this question I am paired with Mr. BLACKBURN, of Kentucky. If present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. MONROE. My colleague, Mr. DANFORD, who is necessarily absent from the House this afternoon, is paired with Mr. HUBBELL, of Michigan, who is absent by leave of the House. If present Mr. HUBBELL would vote "ay," and Mr. DANFORD would vote "no."

Mr. CASWELL. My colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, is absent by leave of the House. If here he would vote "ay."

Mr. HEREFORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIM OF TILTON, WHEELWRIGHT & CO.

Mr. BEEBE. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SAYLER.) The regular order being called for, the House will now resume the consideration of the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department in relation to the claim of Tilton, Wheelwright & Co.

Mr. BEEBE. I understand that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will withdraw his request for the reading of the report, and we propose then to take a vote upon the resolutions accompanying the report without any discussion. If the further reading of the report is dispensed with, I shall call for the previous question and ask a vote upon the resolutions of the majority of the committee without any discussion.

Mr. CONGER. If that proposition is assented to, and on those conditions, I will withdraw my demand for the further reading of the report.

Mr. BEEBE. I now call for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolutions were adopted.

Mr. BEEBE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SINGLETON. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SINGLETON. It is a report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not of so high a privilege as to take the gentleman from Pennsylvania from the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] if it does not come out of my time and does not take away my right to the floor.

Mr. ODELL. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is in order, inasmuch as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] has yielded the floor.

Mr. ODELL. I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. In yielding the floor to the gentleman from Mississippi, I want it understood that I am not thereby taken from the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman necessarily loses the floor when he yields to another gentleman for some other purpose. But the Chair will again recognize the gentleman.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I ask of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] to yield to me for a few moments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Mississippi yields the floor it will be the duty of the Chair to assign the floor.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. If it takes the gentleman from Mississippi from the floor, I will not ask it.

Mr. SINGLETON. It is a matter of indifference to me whether I occupy the floor or not. I only desire to submit a report from the Committee on Printing concerning the printing of the Agricultural Report.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. As I am obliged to leave town by the five-o'clock train, I desire now to submit a report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL. I give notice that after the report of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACDOUGALL] is disposed of I shall call for the regular order.

MAJOR J. T. TURNER.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, Senate bill No. 561 for the relief of Major Junius T. Turner.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Paymaster-General to pay to Junius T. Turner, of Washington, District of Columbia, late a captain in the Third Regiment of Maryland Cavalry Volunteers, such sum as shall equal the travel-pay of a captain of volunteers from Washington, District of Columbia, to San Francisco, California, such distance to be computed by the nearest traveled route.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MACDOUGALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask that the amendments to the bill (S. No. 1021) allowing the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails in their new iron steamships be insisted upon, and that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. WADDELL, Mr. LUTTRELL, and Mr. GARFIELD as the conferees on the part of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I withdrew a moment ago the call for the reading of a report which would have occupied considerable time, mainly in order that some investigating committees who are prepared to report might put in their reports to-night. I refer more particularly, if the chairman is ready, to the investigation of Federal officers in Louisiana. I believe the committee are prepared to make their report without discussion, simply to have it printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who, under the rules, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONGER. There will be no discussion on this report.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. If I am entitled to the floor, I propose to go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman as entitled to the floor.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield for a moment to me that I may introduce a disability bill, which will not take any time.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I cannot yield to any one, because there are so many applications to me that if I should yield to all, I should not be able to proceed.

TEMPORARY APPROPRIATIONS FOR SUPPORT OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, proceeded to address the House, but during the delivery of his remarks, yielded to

Mr. RANDALL, who said: Mr. Speaker, the appropriation bills, I may say, are now substantially agreed upon. There are, however, a thousand amendments embraced in the legislative bill alone, and it is impossible that the clerks can prepare that bill and the others to-day so that they may be presented to the two Houses for final passage. In view of this fact, it has been deemed proper, upon consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury, to present for adoption now a bill making temporary appropriations for the expenditures of the Government. The communication from the Secretary of the Treasury is in these words:

I think the time should be so extended as to cover the passage of the appropriation bills.

LOT M. MORRILL,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Recognizing, in concurrence with the judgment of the Secretary, the necessity for a measure of this kind, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill entitled "A bill to continue the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government.'"

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4087) was introduced and read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the provisions of the act approved July 31, 1876, entitled "An act to continue the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government, approved June 30, 1876,'" be extended and continued in full force and effect until and including the 14th day of August, 1876.

Mr. RANDALL. That is next Monday.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, there being ayes 98, noes not counted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I now return the floor to my colleague, [Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania,] and thank him for his courtesy.

GOLD AND SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, when the hammer fell on my remarks on the silver question last Saturday afternoon I was about to give a brief history of our national legislation on our metallic currency, and being prevented then, I avail myself of the opportunity afforded me now briefly to give that history.

In doing so I will endeavor to avoid treating it from a partisan stand-point, for it ought never to be considered a party question, and I will speak of it entirely as a question of financial policy and political economy.

The only bill as yet reported to the House on this subject is the bill of the gentleman from Missouri, although other bills having a similar effect have been endeavored to be submitted to our attention.

With regard to the bill of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND,] if we strip it of all its machinery of gold notes and silver notes, and gold bars and silver bars, the whole case, in my judgment, lies in a very narrow compass. It is simply this proposition, whether any national legislature can by statute prescribe and fix a certain definite proportion between the values of any two commodities while the production of those commodities is left unrestricted and free, whether those commodities be wheat and corn, or cloth and muslin, or copper and nickel, or silver and gold, or any other products of labor whatsoever.

The friends of the bill of the gentleman from Missouri think that it can be done, and in his bill the gentleman has fixed the proportion between silver and gold precisely at 16 to 1 by authorizing the recoinage of the silver dollar at 412.8 grains and leaving its coinage unlimited and unrestricted, and making it a legal tender of all debts, public and private, to any amount, not specified to be paid in gold coin.

I think the experience of the world shows a sufficient number of instances where governments have endeavored to fix the proportions between different kinds of money and have signally failed, to satisfy any reflecting mind of the impossibility of such a task. Our revolutionary fathers endeavored first to maintain an equality between their paper issues and specie. Failing therein, they next attempted to maintain a definite proportion between their paper money and the Spanish silver dollar without any better success, for as the war went on the paper issues increased and their proportionate values were continually changing.

The French revolutionary government, with its wonderful energy and terribly despotic power, strove to regulate the prices of the products of industry, especially of the necessaries of life, and also to preserve an equality between their assignats and coin. To effect this result they enacted the most severe penalties against any one who should attempt to sell at prices above what were fixed by law or should hold coin at a higher value than the nominal value affixed to their paper currency. They were not, however, more successful than our revolutionary ancestors, and men bought, and sold, and paid prices for commodities, and accepted paper money or specie, according to their own views of their respective values. The laws of trade and commerce were then, as now, stronger than the laws of the national legislature.

As it has been with the prices of other commodities, so has it always been with metallic currencies. Being the products of labor, they are regulated by the same commercial laws as wheat and corn, cotton and muslin, tobacco and whisky; supply and demand, the action of other governments on their currencies, and other factitious circumstances fixing their prices and varying their proportionate values in the markets of the world.

All governments have found it impossible to preserve a fixed and definite proportion between the different metals that they have used for a currency.

Our own country is a notable instance of the difficulty; for although we have had nominally a double standard or bimetallic currency, yet really and practically it has been but a single one, sometimes of silver and sometimes of gold, according to the value we may have affixed by statute to the coinage of either metal.

Under the act of April 2, 1792, establishing a mint, the proportion between silver and gold, at the suggestion of Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, was fixed at 15 to 1. By that act the eagle contained 24.75 grains of pure gold to the dollar or 27 grains standard, and the silver dollar contained 371¼ grains pure silver or 416 grains standard. By that legislation the gold was undervalued and the gold coins were exported to countries where they were valued higher. This proportion remained until 1834, and silver was the practical currency, no gold being seen in the hands of the people as a circulating medium. The gold coinage between 1792 and 1834, both years included, was $15.680,000 only, while the silver coinage, less minor coins, reached $39,690,000.

In an endeavor to obtain a more correct valuation of the two metals and make a more proper adjustment of the proportion between them, Congress, by the act of June 28, 1834, fixed the quantity of pure gold in the eagle at 232 grains or 258 grains standard, the silver dollar remaining as before, thus making the proportion between the two metals, 15.407 to 1.

This change reduced the amount of pure gold in the eagle about 6.26 per cent. on its former weight, and the gold began to circulate as currency. It still did not produce the desired result; and on January 18, 1837, another effort was made to make statutory regulations conform to the laws of commerce, and the weight of the silver dollar was fixed at 412½ grains, the ratio between silver and gold being thus arranged at nearly 16 to 1.

But commerce ruled. The price of silver in the market governed its circulation, and from this period to 1853 the silver coinage disappeared to a considerable extent and the prevailing coinage was gold, the double eagle and the gold dollar having been authorized by the act of March 3, 1849, in the proportions of standard gold in the eagle.

The effect of these laws of 1834 and 1837, together with the discovery of gold in California, was shown in the mint returns, which showed a coinage of gold from 1835 to 1852, inclusive of both years, of $221,011,000, and of silver, less minor coins, of $39,523,000 only.

Notwithstanding these changes in the coinage the silver coins were exported, and, in order to keep sufficient silver coins in the country for change for the use of the people, on February 21, 1853, Congress demonetized those coins of a denomination less than a dollar and fixed the half dollar at 192 grains standard silver and the lesser denominations in proportion, and fixed their legal-tender quality at $5, and authorized the gold piece of $3.

This reduction in weight and change in the proportion between the lesser silver coins and gold to 14.188 to 1 and consequent overvaluation of them, served to keep the subsidiary coins from exportation; but the silver dollar, that remained at its weight of 412½ grains, was undervalued, which, at the ruling prices of silver in the market, caused its exportation, and left gold as the principal medium of exchange for the larger contracts of the people.

The gold coinage from 1853 to 1873 inclusive was $580,111,000, and the silver coinage $65,929,000.

The large production of gold between 1847 and 1873 disturbed the proportion between the silver and gold coins. In the latter year silver sold in the market at one hundred and eighteen cents per ounce, and the silver dollar was worth a fraction over one hundred and three cents in countries using silver coin, but was valued by us at only one hundred cents, and consequently was withdrawn from circulation and exported at a profit to the bullion-broker.

Congress again intervened and made another change in the silver coinage, and in 1873 established the half dollar at 192.9 grains and the minor silver coins in proportion, thus making two half dollars just equal to the five-franc piece of France. It left out of the coinage the silver dollar of 412.5 grains, after full debate on several occasions in the Forty-first and Forty-second Congresses, and authorized the trade dollar of 420 grains for the benefit of the local trade between California and China and Japan, and demonetized the whole mass by restricting its legal-tender power to $5 in any one payment, and made the gold dollar the unit of value.

From this it will be seen that from 1792 to 1834 our metallic currency, although nominally bimetallic, was really only of silver, and from the latter date till now it has practically been only of gold, with the exception of that small portion of silver which has been overvalued and demonetized for the purpose of keeping it as tokens for change in the small transactions of every-day life.

Five different efforts have thus been made by our Congress to establish a double standard of metallic currency, all of which have failed to produce the result desired.

England also tried the experiment with a like want of success. In 1816 she abandoned the effort, and the only silver coins she tolerates are small silver coins or tokens, which are so greatly overvalued that they remain at home for change among her laboring classes and the shopkeepers.

We are pointed to France as an instance of the success of a bimetallic currency, but, like England, she does not allow an unrestricted coinage of silver. In 1866 she formed a monetary union with Italy, Belgium, and Switzerland to last until 1880, as stated in the report of the Director of the Mint for 1875, whereby all silver coins of those countries below the five-franc piece were degraded from 900 parts fine to 835 parts, and the issues restricted to six francs or about 116 cents to each inhabitant, so that her minor silver coins are depreciated in quality, and all are restricted in quantity. It is thus that these countries prevent an excess of issues of silver coins and keep the supply down to what governments may deem the wants of those nations. Their legislation, although somewhat different from ours, has practically the same effect, and shows their consciousness of an inability to keep up a double standard when the production and coinage of the metals are unrestricted.

The Netherlands have closed their mints against silver coinage, except for government purposes.

The mint report just quoted says that the exclusive gold standard since 1870 has been adopted by the United States, Germany, Japan, Sweden, Denmark, and Norway.

The silver standard in Russia, Austria, Mexico, China, and the Indies yet prevails. The double standard exists in France, Belgium, Italy, Switzerland, the Netherlands, Portugal, and Spain to a limited extent. The restricted character of the double standard there I have already shown.

It will thus be seen that all efforts of the nations to keep up an unrestricted double standard have failed. It must necessarily be so, because the proportionate production and uses of the two metals are continually changing, and hence their relative values will change as well.

It is a well known rule of finance that where two currencies of different values are imposed upon a people with intent that they shall circulate together, the cheaper one always drives out the dearer or more valuable one.

It is proposed by the bill of the gentleman from Missouri and other bills that have been offered here to create a silver dollar of 412.8 grains, which is just sixteen times the weight of the gold dollar, and to make it a legal tender for all debts public and private.

The impracticability of using silver for a general and reliable currency may be well seen in its great fluctuating values.

The sales in London rule the market here and fix our prices. English silver is 925 parts in 1,000, fine, our standard is nine-tenths fine.

In 1863 silver was worth 61½ pence per ounce in London, equal to 121 cents here. In 1872 it had fallen to 60¾ pence per ounce, or 119 cents in our currency, making the then silver dollar worth a little over 103 cents, and making it profitable to export it. A month ago it was sold at 47 pence per ounce, equal to 92.726 cents in our currency, and making the silver dollar worth 74.53 cents in gold. At that price it would require 553.87 grains of silver in a silver dollar to make it equal in value to a gold dollar, making the proportion 21.46 to 1. By the last quotations it has risen to 51 pence per ounce, equivalent to 100.6 cents, and worth 86.53 per dollar, or 3.47 cents less than greenbacks, and requiring that there should be 477.04 grains of silver to equal a gold dollar, which would be about equal to 18.5 to 1.

Such fluctuating values would disturb all the contracts and business of the people and would require continuous and vacillating legislation to keep the proper proportions between gold and silver, if we should endeavor to keep up a double standard.

The effect of the contemplated law would be to substitute the cheaper metallic currency for the more valuable one, and remit us back again to a single standard of bulky silver. It would drive every dollar of gold out of the country, and give us a changing standard as variable as an India-rubber yard-stick would be, and would alter, at the same time, all contracts that had been made all over the nation. It would be to require all creditors, whether men working for daily wages or monthly pay, all men on salaries, all annuitants, to receive 13.47 cents in the dollar less than they had bargained for. It would enable the savings-banks to pay their $900,000,000 of indebtedness to the working classes at a sum over 13 per cent. below gold and about 3½ per cent. less than the paper dollar. It would enable the national banks to pay their depositors the $620,000,000 they owe them in depreciated silver at the same reduction. It would reduce the duties on imports to the amount of the difference in value between the silver coinage and the gold in which they are now payable, and encourage the importation of excessive quantities of goods to the injury of the American manufacturer, closing up many establishments and throwing thousands of workmen out of employment.

All duties being then payable under the proposed law in a silver currency, the Government would have to buy gold to pay the interest on the public debt at a heavy loss, but if partisan clamor should drive the Government to pay the principal or interest of the national indebtedness in silver, then the Government creditors would have to take 13.47 cents less in the dollar than they had supposed they bargained for if silver remained at the present rates.

If this construction should be put upon such a law as is proposed, it would be considered a partial repudiation of the national obligations; it would be fatal to our public credit, and would defeat, as I have heretofore said, all efforts toward changing the remaining $1,000,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds to loans at a lower rate of interest, for every lender of money to the Government supposed he was to have gold coin in return. As some of the countries of Europe are demonetizing it as a standard, the increased value which would be temporarily given to it here, if the bill should become a law, would make this country the common receptacle of all the demonetized silver of the Old World and thus eventually bear down its price below its present market rates, for that silver, waiting for a better market, may probably be counted at more than a hundred million of dollars.

Gold, being a scarcer metal and its production less variable, has been considered by most nations the most valuable for a metallic currency. Its prices measured by other commodities do not fluctuate so much or so rapidly as silver, and Mr. Linderman, the able Director of the Mint, in his report of 1873, after stating the disturbances that have arisen in the bullion market, says:

It is evident that Congress acted wisely in establishing gold as the sole standard of value.

He also says in the same report that—

The experiences of different countries, our own included, have conclusively shown that the double or alternate standard of gold and silver at fixed rates is subject to derangement from variations in the relative value of the two metals, and that the steady value of the money unit, which is a matter of great importance, can only be maintained by making one of the precious metals the standard or measure of value, and assigning a subordinate position as to coinage for the other.

From the experience of foreign nations and our own I am satisfied that an unrestricted bimetallic currency of equal value cannot be maintained, and is a commercial and financial impossibility.

In my judgment, then, the passage of the bill would be a national calamity. It would be prejudicial to national credit and national honor, for by the general understanding of the Government and its creditors, as I have endeavored to show on a former occasion, its obligations were understood to be payable in gold, for when our loans were contracted gold was the only metallic "coin," save subsidiary coins, known to the people of the nation; and in addition it would disturb and unsettle all contracts that have been entered into between individuals.

I trust the bill will not be allowed to pass.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] has referred to the payment of Government bonds in gold alone. I wish to ask him whether the act of 1869 does not specifically declare those bonds payable in gold and silver, recognizing silver as well as gold as a proper medium of payment?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. The act of 1869 says that the bonds of the Government are payable in coin. As I endeavored to show on a former occasion, the only coin then known to the people was gold except subsidiary coins not a legal-tender over $5.

I now yield to my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. LYNCH.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LYNCH] is entitled to the thirty minutes remaining of the hour of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Will my colleague [Mr. LYNCH] yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. LYNCH. Before yielding for that motion, I want to make a request of the House. I am very desirous to speak, because my State as well as the race with which I am identified has been very extensively alluded to in discussions in this House. But it would be impossible for me to say in thirty minutes all that I desire to say. I therefore ask the House to allow me, when this question is again taken up, to speak as within my own time, so that I shall be entitled to an hour instead of thirty minutes. I hope there will be no objection to this request.

Mr. BLAND. I shall object, as I want to press the silver bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the position of the gentleman from Mississippi. He occupies the floor for the remaining portion of the hour of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. At the expiration of those thirty minutes, unless there is unanimous consent, his time cannot be extended any further. If any gentleman moves to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, further time may be extended to him, but the Chair would be compelled to give an opportunity for the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. LYNCH. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will withdraw his objection.

Mr. STENGER. When the time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired, I give notice I shall move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. CONGER. I hope there will be no objection to receiving reports for printing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi has yielded to his colleague [Mr. WELLS] to move the House adjourn.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I move the House now adjourn, and insist on the motion being put to the House.

Mr. BANNING. Before we adjourn I should like to make a statement to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Whatever is done must be by unanimous consent.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I will yield to the gentleman for a motion to refer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] be permitted to make his report, to be laid upon the table and ordered to be printed, and also that an opportunity be afforded to submit a report from the minority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not proper for the gentleman from Mississippi to make a motion to adjourn and then parcel out the floor to half a dozen members to introduce this or that proposition.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order of business is the motion to adjourn.

Mr. NEW. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from a select committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would be glad to entertain any request. The mere fact, however, that the gentleman rises to submit a privileged report does not entitle him to be recognized pending the motion to adjourn. If there be no objection, however, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CONGER. It is only to submit a report for printing.

Mr. RICE. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio demands the regular order of business, which is a motion to adjourn; pending that, however, the Chair asks by unanimous consent that a report may be received from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3856) for the relief of William H. French, jr., United States Army, late Indian agent at Crow Creek, Dakota;

An act (H. R. No. 3392) for the relief of John R. Harrington; and

An act (S. No. 779) to provide for the sale of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

APPROVAL OF A BILL.

A message from the President, by U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, informed the House that the President had approved and signed a bill of the House of the following title:

An act (H. R. No. 1336) to establish a new land district in the territory of Wyoming.

COTTON CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, by unanimous consent, lays before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reference to a resolution of the House of March 14, transmitting a tabular statement of cotton claims presented to and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury from January 1, 1865, to January 30, 1876.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that communication be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think the order to print should not be made until the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department report whether its printing is necessary or not.

Mr. WILLIS. If it is not printed, it will facilitate more robbery.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not a question of argument.

The report was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Rev. I. L. Townsend, Chaplain of the House, for one day;
To Mr. ROBINSON, indefinitely on account of sickness;
To Mr. FAULKNER, indefinitely on account of sickness;
To Mr. WALDRON indefinitely;
To Mr. SEELYE an extension for nine days;
To Mr. BAKER, of New York, indefinitely on account of illness; and
To Mr. DAVIS, for ten days from the 11th instant.

CONDUCT OF LOUISIANA FEDERAL OFFICERS.

Mr. NEW. If there be no objection I will submit a report from the committee on the management of federal offices in Louisiana, and ask also that the minority be allowed to present their views, and that both be laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CONGER. I present the views of the minority, and ask that they be printed with the majority report.

Mr. DARRALL. I submit a minority report on that branch of the inquiry relating to the shooting of Senator Twitchell and David King at Coushatta, Louisiana, and ask it be printed with the other reports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection; and the reports will be laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

And then (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, memorials, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. FINLEY: The petition of Eveline Glover, that she be granted a pension from the time of the death of her late husband, who was a private in Company E, First Regiment Florida Cavalry, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of Caroline R. Dulany, widow of Commodore Bladen Dulany, that her pension be increased to $50 per month, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Also, the petition of Sarah A. Auld and Mary E. Duncan, heirs at law of Edward Auld, deceased, for compensation for property taken and used by the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, papers relating to the petition of R. A. Somerville, for rectification of certain allowances to his father, William Somerville, deceased, who was an officer in the revolutionary war, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. WARD: The petition of George E. Ward, late a private in Company K, Thirteenth New York Cavalry Volunteers, for an increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 11, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see that the Journal does not show the motion for a recess that I made, the point of order submitted, and the ruling of the Chair, as I believe the Journal should as a part of the action of the Senate. If that ruling is to stand as a precedent, it ought to be in the Journal, so that we shall know officially what the proceeding was. I think the Journal ought to be corrected in that particular.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. On Tuesday last the Senate entered an order——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had called attention to a question of the Journal which is not yet disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In what respect does the Senator from Vermont desire the Journal to be corrected?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I submit that the Journal is not full in not showing the motion that was submitted for a recess, the point of order that was made upon it, and the ruling of the Senate speaking through the Chair on that point. That was a part of the proceedings of the Senate, and I think the Journal ought to show it. If it is to stand as a precedent, the Journal certainly ought to show it. I, of course, care nothing about it in this particular instance; but I think the Journal always ought to show all the proceedings. This particular instance, of course, is not of the least practical consequence; but as a precedent establishing what the ruling of the Senate is in certain cases the Journal ought to show it, and being a true Journal it ought to show actually the motion that was made, the ruling of the Chair, and the decision of the Senate. It perhaps is not of practical consequence enough in this instance to make any point about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be corrected according to the fact. The RECORD shows substantially how it was, and the Chair was not aware that it was not entered in the Journal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not suppose the Chair was aware that it was omitted from the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The correction will be made according to the facts.

ARTIFICIAL LIMBS TO DISABLED SOLDIERS.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1516) to regulate the issue of artificial limbs to disabled soldiers, seamen, and others, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Messrs. LOGAN, BOOTH, and GORDON were appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PARTITION OF REAL ESTATE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3168) relating to the partition of real estate in the District of Columbia, asking a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the conference asked by the House?

The motion was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. STEVENSON were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

JOHN H. RUSSELL.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. An order was entered on Tuesday last authorizing John H. Russell to withdraw from the files of the Senate his papers in the matter of his claim against the United States for the loss of a steamboat. I find upon inquiry that the petition—there is no bill in the case—has been recommitted to the Committee on Claims. I move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John H. Russell, praying compensation for the loss of a steamer alleged to have been destroyed by the confederates during the late war.

The motion was agreed to.

HAWAIIAN TREATY—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SARGENT. I hold in my hand a telegram addressed to the honorable the Senate of the United States, signed by thirty of the leading citizens and firms of San Francisco. Among others, I see the names of Eugene Casserly and Milton S. Latham, formerly Senators in this body, F. F. Low and Charles Clayton, formerly members of the House, and other gentlemen of the highest character and commercial standing.

This telegram says:

The honor of the country, its national and commercial interests, demand the passage of the Hawaiian treaty bill, and we, the undersigned, humbly pray for immediate action.

I should like to say, with reference to this matter, that the most lively interest in it is felt in San Francisco and on the Pacific coast, and that delay in action upon it is producing considerable confusion to our commercial interests. I am not sure, from some of the telegrams that I have received, but that it would be better if the question should terminate even by defeat rather than to have it hang on, day after day, and week after week, and perhaps go over this session. I earnestly trust that the Senate will give an hour or two to the consideration of this matter and allow it to be terminated.

Mr. MORRILL. I agree with the Senator that it would be most advantageous to the country to have it terminated by defeat.

Mr. SARGENT. I know the Senator's hostility. I should like to ask the Senate to take a recess at five o'clock until half past seven or eight o'clock in order to consider this treaty at the night session. I know how important it is to Senators who desire it that they shall make speeches; but it seems to me that we have now been making speeches for nearly a week and perhaps it will run some time longer. We are coming to the very heel of the session, and night sessions seem to be absolutely necessary in order to attend to legislative business. I, of course, would much rather take up the matter to-day and discuss it and dispose of it by daylight. It would inconvenience me as much as any other Senator, especially after a hard day's work, to come here at night, but I see no other way to have the subject considered. If some Senator can make some other suggestion which will enable me to see through the difficulty I should be happy to hear it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from California that I understand it is not usual to receive as a petition or memorial a telegraphic dispatch. Of course there is not the slightest objection to the Senator calling attention to it, as he has already done; but as a mere matter of precedent and regular proceeding I believe it has been settled often that a telegraphic dispatch cannot be put in as a petition.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not understand it to be within the rule; but I read the dispatch as part of my speech.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say that I feel it an imperative duty, as I gave notice day before yesterday, after the pending order is disposed of to move to take up the constitutional amendment; but I can assure the Senator from California that, so far as the Judiciary Committee are concerned, so far as they can possibly see, we shall not all of us occupy three-quarters of an hour in the whole discussion in presenting the views of the committee and defending them; so that that will take but little time.

Mr. SARGENT. I know how important that amendment is, and I think my views are very much in harmony with the Senator's on that matter; but I have asked the Senate now for some weeks to give me an opportunity to have this measure heard, and by and by I shall submit the motion which I have suggested.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am in favor of sitting right straight along and not having a recess.

Mr. HOWE. Whenever the Senator thinks he is justified in making the motion the Senate will pass upon it properly. I want to say in this connection that I hope there will not be much time taken up in discussing the relative merits of different orders before the Senate. My colleague wants to move the consideration of a bill which, although it does not interest the United States at all, does interest a gentleman whose whole fortune the United States has in possession, and my colleague would like to call the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to make a suggestion, which I think is practical, and that is that after the speech is concluded by the Senator who now has the floor on the pending resolution, that resolution be disposed of. There will be an opportunity to make general speeches upon the matter brought forward by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] by the report of his committee. I myself may desire to speak upon that matter and I know that others will. That can be taken up a little later, and we can meanwhile dispose of some of these urgent matters of legislation, without disposing of which the Senate ought not to adjourn.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no motion pending. Petitions and memorials are still in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts may know what I am about to refer to, the appointment of a commission on the silver question. I was compelled to yield, as Senators are aware. That is the only matter in my charge that is pressing, and I should like to have the Senate act upon it this morning. I suppose there will be no debate about it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think the Senator from Ohio is entitled to have that resolution considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to have it taken up now, unless there is objection. I move that the House resolution on the silver question be taken up.

Mr. LOGAN. I believe the only way to get anything before the Senate is to be persistent. I have tried for nearly a month to get up the bounty bill. I think no business pending is more important than that. I move to take up House bill No. 58, commonly known as the bounty bill, and I ask for a vote on my motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. My motion is first in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio desires to take up what is known as the silver bill. Is there objection?

Mr. LOGAN. I have asked the indulgence of the Senate so often in regard to this matter, and as there seems to be no disposition to allow it to come up, if an objection will put over any of these other measures, I shall object, and I will insist on objecting to everything, I do not care what it is, until I have a vote on taking up this bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me, I want to call his attention to one fact which may affect the motion he makes, and that is the absence of the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES,] who takes a very deep interest in the matter referred to by the Senator from Ohio. I for one should like to hear his views upon it, and probably at a later hour to-day he will be here.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt the Senator from Nevada would be willing to have it taken up. I can say that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] can represent him probably better than any one else on the question when it is taken up.

Mr. HICHCOCK. I presume the Senator from Nevada can represent himself better than anybody else could.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know his opinion about it. However, I only desire to have it considered to-day because I think there will be no serious objection to the passage of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to considering the joint resolution suggested by the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LOGAN. I object.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Until the order of morning business is through, one objection rules it out.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution to print extra copies of the proceedings in the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, with the opinions of Senators, to report a bill as a substitute for the concurrent resolution, and to ask for its present consideration.

The bill (S. No. 1042) to provide for the publication of the report of the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap was read and passed to the second reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it had better go on the Calendar and take its chance with the other unobjected cases, as it is a bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is a bill, but it should be disposed of now for reasons of public economy. I do not care whether these extra copies are printed or not, but I should like to have the matter disposed of, because the type is kept standing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the type up?

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose it will be stereotyped.

Mr. LOGAN. Let the bill go on the Calendar.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives to print additional copies of the report of the commission of engineers upon the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River, have instructed me to report a bill as a substitute for the concurrent resolution. These resolutions are made bills because there is no money already appropriated applicable to this purpose, and if we are to order printing we must appropriate money to pay for it. We have economized the public printing by cutting down the estimates one-third, and then we are constantly called upon to order printing for which there is no appropriation.

The bill (S. No. 1041) to provide for printing the report of the engineers on the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ANTHONY. Both of these bills ought to be disposed of in some way at this time, especially the last one, because the work is not to be stereotyped.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much money does it call for?

Mr. ANTHONY. Fourteen hundred dollars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask whether the general appropriation on the subject will not cover that printing?

Mr. ANTHONY. It will not cover it and cover the ordinary printing ordered by the Senate and the House, such as the printing of bills and reports.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of the District of Columbia, praying that the time fixed by law for the completion of the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue be not extended beyond December next, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1009) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue," approved July 19, 1876, reported in favor of its indefinite postponement.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4085) to repeal part of section 5 of an act entitled "An act authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue," approved July 19, 1876, reported it without recommendation, and asked that it be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. KERNAN. What becomes of the report adverse to repealing the proviso limiting the time for paving Pennsylvania avenue to the 1st of December? Does it go on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is just reported and goes on the Calendar.

Mr. SPENCER. The committee report the House bill without recommendation, and the Senate bill we want indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Both will go on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COOPER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1043) to amend the provisions of section 2966 of the Revised Statutes regulating the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, &c.; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1044) making appropriations to pay judgments of the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

Mr. WINDOM. If there be no further morning business, I move to take up the House bill providing for the expenses of the District of Columbia until December next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio had moved, out of order, however, the consideration of what is known as the silver bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. Did not the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] move to take up House bill No. 58, the bounty bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He did not move to take it up, for he was not in order; but he gave notice that he would move to proceed to its consideration. The Senator from Ohio was out of order, and the Senator from Illinois objected and gave notice that he would move at the proper time to take up the bounty bill. The Senator from Minnesota is the first who has risen in order to move to take up a bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I think it will not take much time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to take up the House bill providing for anticipating taxes in the District of Columbia, reported back from the Senate Committee on Appropriations a few days ago.

Mr. PADDOCK. I understand the Senator from Illinois to object to this.

Mr. WINDOM. The morning business has been concluded.

Mr. LOGAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is before the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Let the Senate decide it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3962) to provide means to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia until December 1, 1876.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. WINDOM called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamlin, Howe, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Morrill, Norwood, Patterson, Sargent, Sherman, West, Windom, and Withers—27

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Cooper, Harvey, Hitchcock, Logan, Mitchell, Oglesby, Paddock, and Saulsbury—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Barnum, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conkling, Conover, Dawes, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Morton, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Whyte, and Wright—34.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the bill by inserting in line 6, after the word "by," the word "temporary," and striking out the words "or otherwise;" so as to make the bill read:

That to enable the commissioners of the District of Columbia to defray the expenses of said District to December 1, 1876, they are hereby authorized to anticipate by temporary loans the taxes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, a sum not to exceed $418,957.96, the interest on which shall not exceed 6 per cent. per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. Permit me to inquire have the preliminary steps been taken to levy this tax and in what shape it is?

Mr. WINDOM. We have passed a tax law, but it does not take effect until December.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It takes effect now, but they cannot get the money until that time. Now I move to amend by adding at the end of the bill:

Said sum so borrowed shall be repaid out of the first avails of said taxes.

Mr. KERNAN. I assume that this is not one of the loans that the United States guarantee, of which we have heard so much. There is no pledge of the United States to repay this.

Mr. WINDOM. There is an express provision that it shall be repaid out of the taxes collected.

Mr. KERNAN. Who becomes liable for it in the mean time? The Federal Government?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us adopt that amendment, and then we can discuss the bill.

Mr. KERNAN. I only want it explained.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I want to say a word on this bill, and I want to speak for one tax-payer in this District, a small one to be sure, and that is myself, in common with all the other tax-payers. This District now owes more than $20,000,000, and we have at last either at this session or the last one—I have forgotten which, this has been so long—made an explicit provision that the total debt of this District should not be increased under any circumstances whatever, which everybody thought, it being between twenty and twenty-five millions, was a very useful although a pretty late thing to do. Now the very first thing that happens about this District afterward is to provide for increasing this debt by nearly a half million dollars. I am opposed to it. I am opposed to it because I can see that although this money is now, as the amendment provides, to be repaid out of the first avails of these taxes next fall, that amount of taxes thus used will leave a deficit the next year of just the same or a greater amount.

So then for one—and I suppose we are likely to stay here all the time during the rest of this Congress apparently—I am willing to have the commissioners of this District get on as best they may, or not get on at all, from now until the time their money comes in, but they can get on. They will have to delay opening their schools for a month or two undoubtedly; they will have to diminish the operations of the board of health; they will have to curtail a great variety of incidental expenses that are wholesome and useful, I agree; but when we are absolutely swamped and crushed with this enormous debt, I want to put in as vigorous a protest as I can, without taking up time about it, against under any circumstances making the debt any larger. If we have not the money, let us wait until we have. Let us get on without the streets being swept, without anything that can possibly be dispensed with, and there is money enough so that it will not become disorganized. Let us get on and start with the money that we raise by this tax; and when the United States wants to appropriate something more, as it ought to do out of its own Treasury to aid from time to time with its share, that will be very well.

Now, as to the remark of my honorable friend from New York, I think the United States will be responsible for this money in the political sense. I do not mean to say that I think they will be responsible for it by a suit in the Court of Claims. I do not say whether they would or would not; but we have exclusive jurisdiction in this District; these commissioners are a corporation, a municipality established by us. We authorize them to borrow certain moneys. There is no power but ours that can take the money from the people by taxes to make them pay it. Therefore the United States are bound in that sense to see to it that the people who loan this money on the credit of the commissioners get it repaid to them and that we cause taxes enough to be raised or money otherwise furnished as a matter of political good faith to make it up.

Mr. KERNAN. I make this inquiry, and I am disposed to join in this most vigorous protest of the Senator from Vermont, because the old law under which the Government is said to be liable now for some $15,000,000, if you will remember its terms, simply provided that the bonds of the District should be issued, and that the Federal Government agreed to fix the proportion that should be paid by the Federal Government, and that it would levy taxes on the District for the residue. The real reason why they became liable at all on these bonds issued, which are not in the name of the Government, is that the Government did agree that it would appropriate its share and that it would cause taxes to be levied on the District; and yet we have run on since 1874 with no government for the District, and there seems to be money now sought which I doubt not it will be claimed if borrowed if we do not get it out of the taxes must come out of the Federal Treasury. Now whether it is to be paid out of the Federal Treasury or by the people of the District, I think from what I can learn that the time has come when we should insist that there shall be no more borrowing of money here; and, as the Senator from Vermont says, let us get along until December and start with the money then and keep from running in debt any more.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senate has already agreed to appropriate $500,000 toward the share of the Government of the United States in the expenses of the District of Columbia. In the sundry civil bill an amendment of that kind was passed by the Senate not authorizing a loan but a contribution of what was believed to be our share of these expenditures for one year. Now, Mr. President, the theory of the Senator from New York sounds very well, but when you take into account the fact that the Government of the United States owns from 40 to 50 per cent. of the property in the city of Washington, which is subject to no taxation whatever, I submit that it is hardly the fair thing to do to refuse to contribute anything toward the expenses. We are as much interested in good government in this District as the citizens are. If the Government property was subject to taxation, these contributions would be wholly unnecessary. We have made them for several years. The Senate, as I said a moment ago, proposed to make this contribution this year, but the House refused to make any contribution whatever.

Now look at the state of the case for a moment, Mr. President. We legislate, as was stated by the Senator from Vermont, for the District of Columbia, and in that legislation we have provided that the authorities shall perform certain duties which require an expenditure of money. Among other things, in the bill which provides for repaving Pennsylvania avenue we require the District of Columbia to take up and relay the water and gas pipes. I believe the District of Columbia is also required to light the entire city. The Government does not pay for lighting at all, except its public buildings. We require certain things with reference to schools, with reference to the police, with reference to the board of health, and in every other way we legislate compelling the District to pay money, and at the same time we put it out of its power to raise money by any means whatever.

The tax law passed at this session postpones the collection of taxes until next December, so that they have no means of providing a revenue from taxation until that time. We have also repealed a law which authorizes the District of Columbia to collect for licenses, and by that repeal I am informed they lose something like $100,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have not repealed all the license laws, only the license on merchants.

Mr. WINDOM. I am told that the change of the license law reduces the revenues of the District $100,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the tax on real estate increases it by more.

Mr. WINDOM. That is true, but that does not take effect until December, and this bill is merely to provide for the expenses of the District until moneys can be received under that law. Having put it out of the power of the District to receive money by taxation, having modified the license law so as to reduce their revenues largely, having provided that they shall perform certain duties requiring money, we have at the same time provided that they shall not borrow money and increase the debt of the District of Columbia under penalties of imprisonment in the penitentiary and a large fine; and now we propose to stand here and say that we will not even give them a dollar as our contribution to the share of the expenses we ought to pay, nor will we let up in the least upon the prohibition to borrow money.

I submit, Mr. President, that this places the District in a very embarrassing position. The very least we can do, if we propose to contribute our fair share of expenses, is to allow them to borrow until our tax laws will bring money into the treasury and re-imburse that amount out of it.

Mr. KERNAN. The Senator from Minnesota does not understand me as complaining of him; but I do desiré to call attention to the state in which we are leaving this District, believing that we never shall improve it until we put a stop to the shiftless, temporary borrowing of money. By the law of 1874, if I remember aright, the prior government was abolished, and in one of the sections it was declared that there should be a commission of members of the two Houses appointed, who should apportion the sum of the expenses of the government of this District which shall be paid by the Federal Government and what portion should be assessed on the property of the District, and that there should be a commission to propose and arrange some government for the District; and yet now, in 1876, there is no provision for a government, as I understand, and there is no apportionment of the amount which shall be paid by the people and what by the Federal Government; but we refuse to appropriate, as it is said, and we go on borrowing.

I concede that there should be ascertained and fixed the sum to be paid out of the Federal Treasury toward the expenses of government in this District, in lieu of what I suppose the General Government ought to be assessed for its property, and that the rest should be assessed upon the property of the District. This is just to the people of the District and I think we should do that and do that the first thing, because if we go on borrowing temporarily, not fixing the share of the Federal Government, not governing it as any other locality should be governed, by some known, fixed regulations and laws, we shall in a year or two have such another scene as when I came into the Senate last January: general denunciation, a great amount of debt, and a great deal of complaint that more had been spent than ought to have been spent.

I am not saying whether that is just or not; but I insist that we owe it to the people of the District, to the property-owners, to the Government—we owe it to all that is thrifty and economical in government that we should not go on borrowing temporarily upon somebody's credit, without any great certainty whose, and not saying how much shall be paid out of the Federal Treasury and how much by the property of the District, and appropriating the one and collecting the other, and not spending any more than we do appropriate and collect.

I say this in the interest of the people of the District and in the interest of the Treasury of the United States, and I hope that that will be done and that we shall not resort to this sort of shiftless mode of getting along which we are permitting and encouraging now

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the Senator from New York says that there has been no proper government formed for this city. That is not the fault of the city nor of the District.

Mr. KERNAN. I am speaking of the legislation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is our fault.

Mr. KERNAN. It is the fault of Congress; so I mean.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is the fault of the Senator from New York, and the Senator from New Jersey, that they have not introduced proper measures for the government of the District, and it is no argument why we should leave this city penniless when we are going off here for three or four months, and the same is true in reference to the apportionment of the sum that the city and the Government should pay. These citizens are powerless, and it seems to me it would be almost disgraceful for the Congress of the United States, when they have the sole power to govern this city, to go off without making any provision for the preservation of the health and property of the city or any provision for the preservation of our own property or the health of the employés of the Government.

As to the United States being liable under this bill I most respectfully beg leave to differ from the Senator. The provision of the bill is that this shall be a temporary loan made by the District of Columbia to be paid out of a certain fund, to-wit, the taxes which shall be collected by next December. If I buy one of these bonds I buy it according to the terms of the bill, and the Government of the United States is in my opinion in no sense liable.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think we had better adhere to the resolution of Congress expressed in the law which prohibits the commissioners contracting any additional debt. It seems to me the Senator from Minnesota might perhaps amend the bill so that they might avail themselves of funds derived from taxing property. While the commissioners are not at liberty, I understand, to collect taxes prior to the 1st of December, if there was a provision in this bill authorizing a small abatement on the voluntary payment of taxes before that time, you would then perhaps be in receipt of sufficient money to carry on the government of the District until the 1st of December, and not commit injustice to any one, and contract no new debt by simply allowing an abatement of taxes. I know that is the policy pursued in some States, to allow a small abatement to persons who see proper to anticipate the time of payment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will say to the Senator that the difficulty about getting in the taxes earlier arises from the time necessary to assess them. The bill passed too late to make the assessment, so that you cannot find out how much the taxes are for some time.

I move now to strike out all after the enacting clause of this bill and insert the following provision:

That the sum of $500,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia as the share of the United States toward the expenses of said District for the year beginning July 1, 1876.

That the Senate has already once passed in the miscellaneous bill, but it was stricken out by the House; and now I can hardly doubt, if the facts be as stated by the Senator from Minnesota, that the House of Representatives, rather than let these people run in debt any more, if they are really in necessity and must have some money, to appropriate some sum (if it is right that the United States should, as we have all once agreed that it is and do agree now) which will contribute our fair share for the time being and not have any experiments of borrowing money.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope that amendment will be adopted. I do not want myself to violate the law we passed early in this session prohibiting the increase of the debt in this District. If the House say $500,000 is too much, let them put it down to $50,000 or whatever they think proper, to be paid out of the Treasury.

Mr. INGALLS. As one member of the Committee on the District of Columbia I have had good reason to be aware of the very anomalous and unsatisfactory condition of affairs in this District so far as relates to taxation and everything else affecting the social condition of the people, and I fully agree with what the Senator from New York has said in relation to the necessity of having some fixed and suitable system for the administration of affairs in this community. But, sir, that is not precisely the question that is now before the Senate. Here is an immediate and urgent and pressing necessity. Congress is about to adjourn, leaving an empty treasury here in the District and no means appropriated for the purpose of carrying on the necessary functions of its government. Therefore, withholding all criticisms as to the condition of affairs here as to the way they have been administered, I ask, what is the duty of the Senate and of Congress in this present juncture? If there is no money with which to pay for the lighting of the streets; if there is no money with which to pay for the necessary repairs that must be made upon the streets and in other portions of the city; if there are no funds with which to carry on the sanitary operations and protect the public health, what is our duty sitting here as one department of this Government? To waste our time in empty criticisms and hostile animadversions about the way affairs have been carried on here? Certainly not. It is our business to make some provision, and immediately and instantaneously, by which the affairs of this District may be continued until such time as the wishes of Congress can be effectuated with regard to a permanent form of government in Washington. The people of this District are not to blame for the present condition of affairs. The law under which the taxes are now being collected was not passed until a period so late that the funds and revenue cannot be obtained in time to realize the necessary money to carry on the necessary affairs of this District. The people are not to blame for it; and therefore they should not be made to suffer for it. We are to blame for it; and therefore if there is anybody to be blamed or if there is any criticism to be made, we are the ones to share it. We ought not to inflict on the people here an unnecessary and dangerous delay.

So far as the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont is concerned, it is undoubtedly correct; but it introduces a new principle that will probably result in hostile action on the part of the House, and may, therefore, defeat the whole object and purpose of the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As it is in the form of an amendment it will probably go to a conference and we can retire if necessary.

Mr. INGALLS. That is very true. In the form of an amendment it may be submitted to a committee of conference of the two Houses; but inasmuch as this same amendment has been once submitted on an appropriation bill, has once been before a committee of conference, and has been rejected, it appears to me as if we ought not to delay action on this bill for the purpose of again repeating an experiment that has once proved to be ineffectual.

I do not like the terms of the original bill. Instead of saying that they are authorized to anticipate the taxes by a temporary loan, it seems to me that it would be proper to say that they should be authorized to make a temporary loan to be re-imbursed out of the first collection made under the tax law that we have passed. I should like to see the bill so amended. It seems to me it is a plain, imperative duty resting upon us to furnish these unfortunate people here with the means of carrying on their government, especially as they are in no sense whatever to blame for the delay.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to hear the amendment of the Senator from Vermont reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $500,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia as the share of the United States of the expenses of said District for the year beginning July 1, 1876.

Mr. HOWE. The whole dispute is between two or three different methods of raising a small sum of money for the use of the District of Columbia. Let us vote, before the District perishes, on these propositions one after the other, until we have voted on the last proposition that is offered. Whatever we agree to, it will either be the bill which has passed the House or some amendment of that bill, which will go to the House, and we shall come to an agreement by and by.

Mr. WINDOM. I feel it my duty to say that, while I cannot accept this amendment from the Committee on Appropriations, as I do not know what their views may be upon it, it so fully accords with my own judgment as to what is right that I am willing to take the chances of securing the action of the House favorable to it. We may not be able to do so, but I cannot bring my mind to vote against this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, as a substitute for the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to amend the title in accordance with the amendment, so as to make it read: "A bill making an appropriation to assist in defraying the expenses of the District of Columbia."

The motion was agreed to.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I addressed the Chair first, Mr. President.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator from Illinois has constructively held the floor for an hour.

Mr. LOGAN. I will only say this about addressing the Chair first: It is the first time I ever knew that question raised after a gentleman was recognized.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator himself if I did not address the Chair first.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know; the President has decided you did not. I was not noticing who addressed the Chair except myself. I know I did; but who did first is a matter for the President, and he has decided that I did.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will let me take this silver commission up; I must leave the city.

Mr. LOGAN. I am sorry for that, because I am sorry to lose the society of the Senator; but at the same time I cannot give up the floor if I am recognized. I move to take up House bill No. 58.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. LOGAN. I make the motion now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Texas [Mr. HAMILTON] is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas is not present.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up House bill No. 58.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of considering House bill No. 58.

Mr. LOGAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] I do not know how he would vote. I should vote "nay," if at liberty to do so.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conkling, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Key, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Spencer, West, and Windom—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Christiancy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Gordon, Howe, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Sherman, Wallace, and Withers—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Barnum, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cockrell, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Morton, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Whyte, and Wright—24.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I now move to take the post-route bill from the table. The Senator who is entitled to the floor is not here. We cannot afford to wait for him to come.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator to let me take up the silver commission bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me get up the bill and then if that will not take time I will yield.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If this resolution is going over, I, according to previous notice, want to call up the constitutional amendment, and I hope my friend from Maine will not press his motion. If this motion is not agreed to I shall move, after my friend from Ohio has had done what he asks the privilege of doing, to take up the constitutional amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to taking up the bill suggested by the Senator from Maine; but I should like to make this proposition to the Senate, to allow the bounty bill just refused to be taken up to be taken up to-night at eight o'clock to be considered. All I desire is this, which I think in all fairness should be done, to have the amendments to the bill read, and the Senate agree or disagree to them, and take the vote. I do not propose to detain the Senate with any discussion; but there are enough people in this country interested in this bill at least to demand that they shall have a vote on the passage of a bill of this character. All I ask is that the bill be voted upon. If there is a majority of the Senate against it, that will end it. If there is not, let the bill be passed. I do not want to detain the Senate by discussion, but I want a vote on the bill. It has been here certainly long enough and been laid out of the way for every other measure that has come up before the Senate. I do not think it is right for us to evade a square vote on the bill. There is no other way to get it up. If the Senate will agree to take it up to-night at eight o'clock, it will not take an hour unless somebody wants to discuss it. I will not take fifteen minutes unless some question may be asked that calls for an explanation. I will agree that I will not take over fifteen minutes in explanation of the provisions of the bill and then I will ask for a vote unless it is in answer to some question Senators may ask me in regard to some provision in the bill. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Maine is pending. The Senator from Maine has moved to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of considering the post-route bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I want to say that I am not opposed to any bill that shall fairly and properly equalize bounties. This bill is not such a bill. It is a bill to add one-half to the pay of the Army during all the time of the rebellion. But there is another thing in relation to the bill——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, what is the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska makes the point of order that the discussion is not on the pending question. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I desire to say that I am opposed to taking it up because I do not believe that in the time we now have we can so lick the bill into shape that it can possibly be executed. There is no provision for furnishing the funds; and this session is now so near a close that I despair of making any appropriation for the additional number of clerks, at least three hundred or more in number, that it will require to execute the law if the bill should be passed.

Mr. President, again I am satisfied that we ought not at this——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is debate in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is within the rules confined to the question before the Senate. The Chair supposed the Senator was speaking about postal clerks, but observes that his remark relates to clerks for the War Department.

Mr. MORRILL. I am speaking against the propriety, on account of the shortness of time, of taking up this bill, because I do not believe we have time, as I have said, to lick it into shape so that the soldiers will reap the benefit of it instead of the claim agents. I think that the opening of the accounts of all the soldiers of the war would merely open it for the benefit of the claim agents, and not of the soldiers. I will be prepared to show, when I have time to discuss the merits of the bill, that it will require one hundred and fifty or more millions of dollars from the Treasury, which is not provided for, and is indispensable whenever the bill becomes a law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the Senator that the bounty bill is not before the Senate. The question is on taking up the post-route bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask permission of the Senate to reply for just one minute to the statement of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LOGAN. I desire just one moment. I did not intend to discuss the proposition; but I cannot allow to pass unnoticed such remarks as the Senator from Vermont has made, so uncalled for and so unsupported by the record. I know he is a gentleman of great information, and I supposed he had more on this subject than he exhibits. His statement that this is to pay double to soldiers for their service in the field is not warranted by any fact in the record. It is a proposition to pay the soldiers that which the law gave them and, by certain orders of the War Department, prohibited them from getting by their being mustered out of the service before their time had expired. The object of the bill is to give to those soldiers what the Government owes them and not what the Government does not owe them; and for the Senator to say that there is not time to lick this bill into shape is saying that the committee has not the ability to make a proper bill. This bill needs no licking into shape; and it does not require the money to be paid either this year or next, but only provides that these soldiers shall receive what the law authorized them to receive during the war, and it will not do for the Senator to dodge on the ground that there is not appropriation in this bill. I have always the manliness when I oppose a bill to say that I oppose it. But to undertake to oppose a bill by stating facts that do not belong to it and are in no wise connected with it is unworthy of the Senator from Vermont and of the candor that he usually exhibits. I say in my place now that this is a bill to pay the soldiers what the Government owes them and what the Government has failed to pay them.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think the Senator from Illinois is responsible for the shape of this bill, as it comes to us from the House; but I wish to ask him what was the pay of the soldiers during the war, and if this is not an additional eight and one-third dollars a month when the pay was $16?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must call for the regular order. My friend from Illinois has had his three minutes.

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer the question and then yield.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator may go on another minute.

Mr. LOGAN. I only want to answer that question. The Senator misapprehends it. He says this adds to their pay. It does not. The Congress of the United States gave to the soldiers a certain amount of money as bounty over and above their pay. It gave $100 for one year, $200 for two years, and $300 for three years; and this is to supply the deficit that the Government failed to pay them when they had not served the exact time but were mustered out sooner, for instance, a day or two days before their time expired. Then the Government refused to pay them the bounty at all because they had not served the entire time for which they had enlisted. This is to give them the eight and one-third dollars a month for the time they served and equalize them with those who did serve out the time; and that is all there is in it.

Mr. MORRILL. Let me ask the Senator, for he is perfectly familiar——

Mr. BOUTWELL. I rise to a question of order. I insist we ought to proceed with the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The debate is by unanimous consent, and objection is made to its further continuance.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I hope the Senate will give unanimous consent to consider this bill this evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question is not before the Senate. Several Senators have objected to debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves the postponement of the present and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the post-route bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I of course have no particular opposition to the post-route bill, but I think it ought to wait until we act on the constitutional amendment which the House has sent over to us, and I ask my friend therefore to let me call up that and then I shall have no objection to yield to him.

Mr. HAMLIN. I submit the matter to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I hope the Senate will not agree to my friend's motion, and if it does not I will move to take up the constitutional amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The question being put, the ayes were 32.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I give it up. The constitutional amendment has no chance against the post-route bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Maine is agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1007) concerning the employment of Indian scouts.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3083) to remove the political disabilities of C. M. Wilcox, of Maryland; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 779) to provide for the sale of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska;

A bill (H. R. No. 3392) for the relief of John R. Harrington;

A bill (H. R. No. 3856) for the relief of William H. French, jr., United States Army, late Indian agent at Crow Creek, Dakota; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4087) continuing the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide temporarily for the expenses of the Government."

PETITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying relief from alleged hardships incident to the requirements of the homestead law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE POST-ROUTE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3628) establishing post-roads, the pending question being on the following amendment proposed by Mr. HAMLIN as an additional section:

SEC. 2. That section 1 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877 and for other purposes," approved July 12, 1876, be, and the same is hereby, amended by repealing the following words:

"Provided, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to re-adjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, for transportation of mails on railroad routes by reducing the compensation to all railroad companies for the transportation of mails 10 per cent. per annum from the rates fixed and allowed by the first section of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes' approved March 3, 1873, for the transportation of mails on the basis of the average weight."

And that the sum of $900,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for transporting the mails of the United States on railroads.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, at the time when the Senate had under consideration the bill which is now before us, I had been inviting its attention to the propriety of making a provision for the restoration of what are called the fast-mail trains, and I had introduced an amendment to accomplish that object. The bill was summarily laid upon the table, and I think now, with the addition of that power which belongs to fast trains, I have finally succeeded in getting the bill again before the Senate. I had addressed the Senate perhaps half an hour in relation to that subject, and at that period of time what I proposed to say would have occupied about another half hour. So, while other gentlemen have been addressing the Senate on other questions, I have occupied the position of having a speech half delivered for several days, and as Senators have questioned somewhat the courtesy which I manifested in seeking to get this bill again before the body I mention it.

I said the other day that time was money to the business man, and I will change the axiom and say that time is of value to the legislative body and especially to this body now; and I will not continue the debate in relation to the fast-mail service, but will leave it for the judgment of the Senate upon what I have already said, adding only that I will withdraw the amendment which I submitted the other day, which was a repeal of the 10 per cent. reduction applied to all roads, and present a new amendment applying only to the New York Central, and the Michigan Southern route to Chicago, and the Pennsylvania railroad to Saint Louis, and then to leave the Senate to determine what they will do. I withdraw the pending amendment, but I submit two or three amendments for additional routes to the bill which I ask the Senate to adopt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendments are, after line 819, to insert:

From Ferrytown to White Plains.

After line 1053 to insert:

From Charlotte to Bellburg.

After line 96 to insert:

From Fresno, via Fort Miller, Big Dry Creek, Academy, to Toll House.
From Fresno to Riverdale.
From Visalia, via Grangerville, to Leonore.

Mr. HAMLIN. I now submit the following amendment for the restoration of what were called the fast mails——

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask the chairman to give way for me to offer a little amendment in respect to a new route.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir. Let the Senator have his amendment put first.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move to insert after line 724:

From Nebraska City, via Glen Rock and Sheridan, to Humboldt, Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now I offer my amendment, and ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read:

SEC. —. That the sum of $150,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury arising from the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, in addition to the sum appropriated for inland mail transportation by railroad by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," approved July 12, 1876; Provided, That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to only apply this sum to restoring, so far as it may be possible to do so, the transportation of the mails by the fast-mail trains, by the New York Central, the Hudson River, and Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroads between New York and Chicago, and over the Pennsylvania Railroad and its connections between New York and Saint Louis, New York and Chicago, and New York and Cincinnati.

Mr. HARVEY. I did not hear distinctly the reading of the amendment, and I wish to ask the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post-Roads, what is the amount proposed to be appropriated?

Mr. HAMLIN. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. HARVEY. And to be applied to the railroads named simply for the purpose of the transmission of the fast mails?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARVEY. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. Early in the session we had before us a bill fixing the rate of postage on third-class matter. That bill was unsatisfactory to half the Senate; but being presented by a united committee, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, the bill brought forward by that committee was sustained here against a proposition which I offered to reduce the postage on third-class matter to the rates which had existed prior to the 3d of March, 1875. That was done for the reason urged by the committee that it was necessary to do so in order to make as nearly as might be the Post-Office Department self-sustaining. I never believed that the Department should be made self-sustaining. I earnestly advocated such a rate of postage as had existed prior to the amendment I have alluded to and which was passed in an appropriation bill on the 3d of March, 1875. The Senate was equally divided on that proposition, and it was lost for the lack of a single vote. The bill then went to the House of Representatives, and was considered by a committee of conference, the result of which was that a compromise was agreed to that is, if possible, more unsatisfactory than either of the propositions, a compromise which makes discriminations between certain classes of third-class mail matter that seems to rest on no reason at all. For instance, I will cite the fact that in that classification sheet-music, which is classed as third-class mail matter, is transmitted at the rate of one cent for two ounces, and seeds, cuttings, bulbs, and other matters of that kind, recognized as third-class matter, also are transmitted at the rate of one cent per ounce, being double the rate charged upon sheet-music and other third-class matter rated without any more apparent reason than there is in the discrimination between these two kinds of articles.

But, independent of this question, I am opposed to the proposition for another reason. The Senator from Maine the other day in the first part of his speech stated that we are without any remedy; in other words, that we are at the mercy of a few men controlling the lines of railroad mentioned in this amendment. Sir, if I understand it aright, all the railroads in this country have been declared post roads, and if a necessity arises I think it is within the power of this Government to make provision to have the mail carried on those routes in whatever way may be deemed just to the parties owning the roads, and this can be reached by the Government under the right of eminent domain, if necessary.

I am, therefore, opposed to making a discrimination in favor of these lines and in favor of that small proportion of the people of this country classed as business men in the sense in which the term is here used, meaning simply merchants and bankers and others engaged in the transmission of matter through the mails for the purpose of mercantile gain.

There is a very large proportion of the people of this country who deem it of more importance that the people at large, the people residing in small towns and villages and on the farms in the rural districts, should have at least equal facilities for the transaction of their business through the mails with the class that I have alluded to.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to ask the Senator if on all the remittances that are made from the State of Kansas to the commercial center of New York or the commercial center of Chicago and all the remittances that may be sent or credited from New York or Chicago to Kansas in the transactions as to grain and other products of that State one day's interest saved on every remittance and on every credit would not be of very great benefit to every citizen in his State, directly or indirectly?

Mr. HARVEY. I apprehend that the interest of the majority of the citizens of the State in that matter would be exceedingly remote. I fear it would be so remote that it would be hardly appreciable.

Mr. PADDOCK. Well, sir, I will say that it is considered of so great importance by the banks and others at Chicago who make great daily remittances from that city to New York that they are willing to undergo almost any other privation rather than of this fast mail. I know that is the case with the commercial center in my State, Omaha.

Mr. HARVEY. I am aware that this would be a great benefit to the city of Chicago. That is unquestionable. It would be a great benefit to the particular lines of railroad mentioned in this amendment. That is unquestionable. But it involves the necessity of making an additional appropriation of $150,000 for the purpose of inducing those companies to run a train a little more rapidly than the usual mail trains upon their roads when they are already receiving a compensation larger than that given to any railroad in the civilized world for the transmission of the United States mail. I say that the advantages resulting to the people of the United States are not sufficient to warrant that expense and the concession of the principle that is involved in it.

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEST. I presume the Senator is informed on the subject, and I for one should like to be informed, and I have no doubt the Senate would. I wish to ask him what is the basis for his statement that mails are carried in this country at a greater cost than in any country in the civilized world? I do not question the truth of the statement, but I should like the Senator to state to us if he knows—he must have had some information to base that statement on—what it costs to carry the mails in France and in England on railroads.

Mr. HARVEY. Well, sir, I have not at hand the statistics. I did not expect this question to come up this morning, but I think the Senator can easily satisfy himself on that point.

Mr. WEST. I have not been able to do so.

Mr. HARVEY. The mails in France and England are transmitted much more often, much more expeditiously than they are on the generality of routes in this country, and therefore there may be at first sight an apparently greater expenditure there than in this country; but I abide by the fact that I have stated, and I have no doubt that I can produce the authority.

But I was going on, when interrupted by the Senator from Louisiana, to speak of the principle involved in this matter. The roads mentioned in this amendment are the very roads spoken of in the report of the Special Committee on Transportation of the Senate, who tell us that a few men controlling these roads at their will impose a heavy tax upon the business of this country for the transmission, not of the remittances spoken of by the Senator from Nebraska involved in the transactions of the commercial business he alluded to, but of the products themselves constituting the basis of that business. I say it is reported by the Committee on Transportation that a few men controlling these roads at their own sweet will impose on the people of this country taxes on the transmission of the necessities, the absolute comforts, and the few luxuries that the people generally of this country are enabled to obtain; these railroads levy a tax upon them such as neither this Congress nor any other legislative body in this country would dare to impose. It would create a political revolution, as they say and say truly. And yet these few men, not satisfied with the power which they enjoyed at that time, must levy upon the Government itself for the transmission of its official mail matter in a few hours less than they have been accustomed to carry it, and for the intelligence which the Government assumes to convey by its mail lines, an extra compensation of $150,000, and that for a matter in which few people comparatively are interested and by which none of the other lines of transportation of the mails are benefited. It is simply a concession of that much money to a position that these men have taken that the laws must be made to conform to their peculiar interests.

For these reasons, which I have stated hurriedly, not being fully prepared to discuss the question because I had no anticipation this bill would come up to-day, I am opposed to this amendment and I hope it will not prevail, and I am fearful that, should the amendment prevail, it would involve the loss of all that is contained in the bill.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, as I had the honor to serve with my esteemed friend from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] upon the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the post-office appropriation bill, I desire to say a few words in behalf of the proposition that he has submitted to the Senate at the present time.

The fast-mail system of the United States, as we all know, is a recent improvement of the expedition with which the public business is generally transacted in the North and the West. It has met, I think, with the community at large as much favor as almost any proposition of that character that has ever come under their notice. When the House of Representatives refused to accede to the ideas of the Senate to the extent that would permit the continuance of the fast-mail service, as one of the conferees on the part of this body I felt that it was my duty to permit the sacrifice of that service rather than to have the stoppage of the service at large. But since the result has developed that that action has ended the fast-mail service in this country such representations have come to us from the public through the press and other mediums as should induce us to consider the propriety of its restoration.

Now I ask attention of the Senate for a moment to the amounts of money that have been used in the last fiscal year and are proposed to be used in the various characters of mail service throughout the country in the coming year.

By an official statement which I have from the Postmaster-General, I find that the amount of money expended in the railroad service for the fiscal year just ended was $9,874,956. We have appropriated $9,100,000 for the ensuing year, $774,000 less than the preceding year, abating the amount payable to these railroads by 10 per cent., and not allowing for any possible increase natural to the service. So we are going into an expenditure this year of $9,100,000 against $9,874,000 last year. But how is it with the remote districts represented here by my friend from Kansas? How is it with those suffering people in the remote West, who, the Senator says, are not to be benefited by this appropriation? Instead of curtailing their facilities, instead of reducing the amount to carry mails in Kansas by the stage routes and by horses, we give $1,100,000 more this year than we have ever given before. I will substantiate that statement by the quotation which I will make:

The amount for star and steamboat service—

Star service it is well known means the mails carried by stage and horses—for the year ending June 30, 1876, was $5,634,403.

The amount that we have appropriated for these citizens of Kansas and on the frontier and in the extreme West who are not benefited, the Senator says, by the fast mails in the localities here specified—although that is a point which I will answer—is this year $6,730,851. In other words, we have cut down the service at home, in the very heart of the system, three-quarters of a million and added to the extremities $1,100,000. If the Senator will answer the proposition how the extremities are to be saved when you cut off the circulation at the heart, I shall be obliged to him.

That this reduction was made, and that it was justifiably made, I have no doubt. The rates upon railroad transportation were raised before the panic. Since that time there has been a general cutting down in prices all over the country, and notably in railroad freights. Therefore the reduction was justifiable, and I went with the House, and the committee of which I had the honor to be a member went with the House in that reduction; but we warned them, "Do not pare too close;" we pleaded with them for a few hundred thousand dollars to maintain this fast-mail service, but our efforts were of no avail; and what is the consequence? If we can facilitate the service on behalf of the people of the United States situated on the frontier and in the remote districts of the country, where it is well known that the mail service contributes nothing to the support of the Government, but, on the contrary, is an extreme expense, why not facilitate it in the regions where it does pay, for the mails from New York and Chicago undoubtedly return a large percentage in excess of the expense? Surely the proposition is reasonable. Surely it would conduce to the benefit of those in the remote districts as well as those in that immediate section of the country.

The Senator should not ignore the question which was put to him by the honorable Senator from Nebraska when he called his attention to the fact that the remittances between Chicago and New York were facilitated and expedited twelve hours by this process. I ask him, is it no benefit to the men out West who are remitting their money to the commercial centers of the country that twelve hours shall be gained on every one of them? Can the Senate contemplate, can any gentleman here tell me, how much money is passing hourly and momently through the mails of the United States, in regard to which time is money? Will not the little pittance of $150,000 asked for in this proposition to restore a fast-mail service be paid, and be paid over and over again, to the people of this country by the saving of interest on their remittances? Most assuredly and most undoubtedly it will. If we can in our bounty and according to our conception of what is just to these remote districts furnish them with a million and odd dollars more than we gave them last year, can we not cut off this $150,000 instead of $750,000, the amount which was given to these railroads?

The Senator says a few railroads are preying upon the people. If they are preying upon the people, they are not preying through the Post-Office Department, because nobody has ever disputed the idea that the railroads throughout the country, at the rate of compensation given to them by the Government of the United States, are not paid in proportion to their other business.

This is a small matter. We have cut down, I repeat again, $750,000 over the amount expended last year and we have cut too close. That is my opinion, and I think it will be the opinion of the Senate; I am quite confident that it will meet the approbation of the House at the other end of the Capitol. I think it ought to be done, nor can I see nor have I heard anything advanced that should prevent it when it is known that we are deprived of these privileges.

Mr. MAXEY. I was a member of the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the post-office appropriation bill, and I agreed to the report of the conference committee. The principal trouble between the two Houses was in regard to the compensation to railroads for carrying the fast-mail service. I then believed that report was a just and fair compromise between the two Houses who disagreed, and I signed the report along with the other members of the Senate committee. It was signed correspondingly by the conferees on the part of the House and it was adopted by both Houses. I regarded that as a settlement of a very disputed question between the two Houses. I believed that, in accordance with the great reduction which has taken place throughout this country in everything, there should be a decrease in the compensation paid to railroads corresponding to that which has taken place everywhere else. That report was unanimously adopted in the conference committee and adopted by both Houses. I may be mistaken but it occurs to me that if the proposition of the Senator from Maine is adopted now, it is a departure from that which was settled by that conference committee. That is the view which I take of it.

One other point. It has been said here to-day, and it has been said on many other occasions, that in the newly settled parts of the country the mails are really an expense to the Government. Undoubtedly that is true. It has been true of every State as it was being settled, but the policy of this Government has been to settle up its new Territories and to advance intelligence into the country as it was being settled. That has been carried out in all the States as they were being settled. The Post-Office was an expense to the older and more populous States until the country became settled up. That is true of that country which is now being settled up, and the policy which has been pursued in sending mails out from the centers into the newly settled country is a policy which is pursued toward every State now settling up. It is but just and right that that should be done, although it may be an expense to the general public.

In respect of this fast-mail service, while all admit that it may be a matter of convenience and to certain localities a matter of importance, yet the question which was before my mind in the conference was, is it of such importance that the whole people of the country should pay this large amount of money which we have cut down, $900,000? Is it of so much importance that we shall extend this fast-mail service for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many? We have now a proposition to appropriate $[illegible]00,000 for a service that is limited to certain railroads named, yet to my mind the same proposition still presents itself. While it may be and doubtless is of importance to certain portions of the country, it is not of that importance that will justify taking out of the Treasury of the whole people that amount mainly for the benefit of a few.

But the principal point which I desired to mention was the view that I took of it as a member of the conference committee, and I only did so because I regarded the course pursued by that committee as right and as a settlement of the question. I think so yet, and I therefore stand by the report of that committee, which has been adopted by both Houses.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to say one word in relation to what has fallen from the Senator from Texas. The Senator from Texas is right in saying that the whole committee agreed to the report in relation to the post-office appropriation bill; but that Senator will recollect distinctly, I am quite sure, that it was done under the expression of the belief that it would not stop what were called the fast-mail trains. That was the belief expressed by all the House members of the committee; and while it was not my opinion I knew very well that I might err and they might be correct. I therefore agreed to it.

This is the case in a nut-shell: We have here a bill that appropriates $1,000,000 to establish exterior post-offices and post-routes, to which I agreed as a matter of right; but when you come to the great arteries that furnish the communication and the revenues of your Department, which do the great amount of business, and they ask that they shall be accommodated in the transmission of the mails they receive twenty-four hours between Chicago and New York, and that it shall be done only at the expense of $150,000, I appeal to the Senator from Texas and ask if it is not a policy which those who are interested in the little offices ought to adopt? I ask if in justice, I ask if in right, I ask if in accordance with the best interests of the service, the great channels ought not to be accommodated to that small extent, while we are at the same time accommodating the exterior offices to the amount of $4,000,000? That is the way in which it is presented precisely. It is simply and only to remedy a condition of things which it was believed would not exist if the 10 per cent. reduction on the railroad service was adopted all over the country. A road that carries your mail thirty-five miles an hour is entitled to more compensation than that which makes but twenty miles.

The whole question is whether we shall restore this fast service. I believe it ought to be done. I am quite sure, I am positive that if I had known the reduction would have discontinued this service I never would have agreed to the report of the conference committee. Every member who did sign it signed it with the belief that it would not accomplish that result. To that extent it would change the action of the report of the conference committee if this amendment should be adopted, none else; it only meets a contingency which it was not then supposed would arise. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine whether he thinks the action on the part of the railroad companies was simply a "bluff game," or whether they could not afford to carry the fast mail?

Mr. HAMLIN. They cannot do it at the reduced rate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In addition to what the Senator from Texas has said in reference to this proposition in relation to the report of the conference committee, I think we ought to consider this question carefully. The proposition is to pay certain railroads, two, I believe, a specified sum of money for placing upon their lines fast-mail trains. That these fast-mail trains would be an accommodation to a certain extent, and to a very considerable extent, I admit, to certain business interests of the country. There can be no question about that.

In the first place, while we are economizing, while even the public service is said to be greatly embarrassed by the economy which is instituted, is it not proper to be careful how we pay for that special service which is but a luxury to the business interests of the country? It is not indispensable, because their mails will be carried even if the fast mails shall not be put on. They will be carried in the usual time that they have heretofore been carried, because this fast-mail service is comparatively an experiment yet. Besides that, there are other sections of country than those which are supposed to be aided by fast-mail service that have equal claims upon the attention of Congress. What particular advantage should New York and Chicago and other northern cities which are benefited by this service have over other sections of the country? For instance, suppose the Baltimore merchants desire a fast mail, they have as much claim to be served with that fast mail as the merchants of New York and the merchants of Chicago. Suppose some men want a fast-mail train from here to New Orleans by the way of Richmond and Atlanta. They have just the same right to ask that a small appropriation shall be made for that. Where, I ask, is the expense of this service to stop?

Besides, I do not hesitate to say that your mails will go by fast trains whether you adopt this amendment or not. I know that it is desirable to the railroad companies to be paid liberally for these fast-mail trains, and I am aware that they have threatened to discontinue the service if they are not paid; but as an American Senator, legislating for the interests of the whole people, I close my ears to the threats of the railroad companies in any such thing. If it does not pay, then let them not do it; it is their right, their privilege, to stop; but their threats to me are not to influence my action in any respect. If I am willing that the mail service shall be properly performed, then I close my ears, I repeat, to any intimation or threat on the part of any railroad corporation that they are going to discontinue a service which may be desirable to the business interests of society. Your fast mails will go, whether this amendment shall pass or not; but, as a matter of course, if the railroad companies by temporarily lopping off these mails can come to Congress and extort appropriations to carry them, they will do so. When they find that the Congress of the United States are determined not to yield to any such demand, they will comply with the wishes of the public. In my opinion they could afford to run even fast-mail trains without the 10 per cent.

After all, while I consider that the fast-mail trains are an advantage to the business interests of the country to a certain extent, I do not believe that they are of such paramount importance as to justify us in entering upon appropriations for carrying fast mails through every portion of this country; because it would tax very heavily the Post-Office Department and increase the expenses of that Department. I see no special reason why a particular section or locality should have the benefit of this service, which is not proposed by this amendment to be extended to other sections of the country. It is said that they are benefited in certain points beyond these centers. I ask if the mails for Richmond and Saint Louis have to be carried to Chicago to be distributed. There are mails to Cincinnati, there are mails to Louisville; and once you establish the policy that certain localities shall have the advantage of fast-mail trains by special appropriations in that behalf, you will have petitions here from other sections of the country praying that similar justice may be done to them, and that they may have the same advantage.

I dislike very much to vote against any amendment which emanates from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, especially when it meets the approbation of the chairman of that committee, who I know is very careful in all he does on a question of that kind; but an honest conviction that this amendment ought not to pass induces me, reluctantly, I admit, to vote against it.

Mr. DENNIS. I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, because any restriction upon the transmission of information is a step backward in this age. I am not only willing to vote for that amendment but I move to add to it the following:

And to enable the Postmaster-General to arrange for fast-mail trains over the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad and over the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and its connections to Washington, Saint Louis, and Chicago, $75,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BURNSIDE in the chair.) The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Maine as amended.

Mr. DAVIS. Let it be reported as amended, so that we may understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert as section 2 the following:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $150,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury arising from the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, in addition to the sum appropriated for inland mail transportation by railroad by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," approved July 12, 1876: Provided, That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to only apply this sum in restoring, so far as it may be possible to do so, the transportation of the mails by fast-mail trains over the New York Central and Hudson River and Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroads, between New York and Chicago, and over the Pennsylvania Railroad and its connections between New York and Saint Louis, New York and Chicago, and New York and Cincinnati: and to enable the Postmaster-General to arrange for fast-mail trains over the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad and over the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and its connections to Washington, Saint Louis, and Chicago, $75,000.

Mr. SAULSBURY and Mr. HARVEY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I know that this proposition is calculated to increase the expenses of the Post-Office Department, and I think that the expenses of that Department are already sufficiently high. This was the judgment of the Senate in passing upon the post-office appropriation bill. I do not know where this matter is to stop. If we are to go on all over the country and pay for extra mail service, where is the limit?

Mr. HAMLIN. If the Senate will lay this bill on the table or indefinitely postpone it we can save another million of dollars. It is a simple question whether you will expend a million of dollars to have new routes and then deny the great heart of the country that communication which it needs.

Mr. SAULSBURY. So far as the provisions of the bill are concerned it is simply to extend the ordinary postal facilities by connections to neighborhoods that do not now have them. The general object of the bill is simply to establish post-routes where the people have no post-routes. To that bill it is proposed to append a provision to pay for specified services for certain localities where they have already great postal facilities. The amendment of the Senator is not on a par with the general provisions of the bill. I am aware of the character of the bill. It is to establish certain post-routes. Why? Because there are certain localities that have no postal facilities. To such a bill is appended an amendment to pay for special service by fast-mail trains, for the benefit of certain other localities that already have very great postal facilities. There is a very marked difference between the general features of the bill and the amendment of the Senator from Maine. At any rate, I shall record my vote against the whole bill if such a provision as that is made.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Maine will be adopted. I believe that the business interests of the country demand that this fast mail shall be kept up and maintained. The only objection I have to it is that it does not go far enough. While it provides for the transmission through the main arteries of commerce of this fast mail, it stops before it reaches the end. I believe that this fast mail should not only be put on and kept on to Chicago, but be extended to Omaha.

The objection is raised by the Senator from Delaware that it is to give specific facilities to localities. The proposition is to extend fast mails through the whole central arteries, and I believe that it is for the general good that this proposition should be adopted. While I do not desire, by the amendment which I propose to offer, to embarrass it in any way, I wish to have a vote of the Senate upon a proposition to extend the fast-mail service from Chicago to Omaha.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senator will not offer that amendment now. Let us hold on to what we have got. I trust the time will come, I doubt not it will, under a commission which will be appointed in pursuance of the law we have passed this year to arrange the compensation of our railroads, when we shall ultimately regulate the cost of transporting our mails upon three principles, speed, weight carried, and amount of service rendered. It is now done almost exclusively upon weight. But in doing so much as we do, my friend from Nebraska will get his mail twenty-four hours earlier by keeping this amendment in than he gets it to-day. The effect will be the same in the East; so that all the length and breadth of the land will receive the benefit of the twenty-four hours which are saved by the present fast mail. I have no more doubt about it than I have of my existence that there ought to be a great trunk fast mail through the country east and west and another north and south, with their compensation predicated upon the rate of speed that they make and the amount of service they perform. Then the smaller routes and the smaller offices will all reap the benefit, though not as immediate and direct as the others. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not embarrass the bill by adding on to it collateral questions by amendments to the amendment; but let us take the amendment as it now is and have the sense of the Senate upon it.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to remind my colleague on the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, the distinguished chairman of the committee, that this shortening of time between Chicago and Omaha is not alone for the benefit of Omaha and Nebraska. That is the connecting link between the whole country to the westward, and half a continent will have the speed of its mail increased at least twenty-four hours if this service can be extended to Omaha. All of California and Oregon, all the Pacific coast from the southernmost limit of California to Alaska will receive the benefit of such an extension. It certainly is a very important amendment and ought to be adopted. I feel myself authorized to say this because the question did not arise and was not considered by the committee as a whole. While I agree with my friend that nothing should be done to embarrass the progress and final passage of this bill, and indorse the sentiment, in that respect, of my colleague from my own State, yet at the same time the proposition of my colleague is so important a thing to be accomplished that it seems to me that the Senate ought readily to consent that it should be done.

Mr. LOGAN. I agree with the Senator from Maine. I certainly have no opposition to, or desire to interfere with, the proposition of the Senator from Nebraska; but believing that we can get what the Senator from Maine proposes and that it is all we can get, I shall certainly support his amendment. The time shortened between New York and Chicago, so far as the expense is concerned, more than repays the people who are benefited by these fast-mail trains in the saving of interest between business men in the transmittal of checks, drafts, &c., between those two cities. If you cut off the number of hours each week that is saved between these cities, the amount of interest on the commercial paper that passes between these two cities, by any kind of calculation you will find the benefit to those people much greater, to such a degree, it seems to me, that the country cannot afford to strike down the facilities that have been afforded to those people in their mail matter. All I desired was to make the one suggestion which I have made.

Mr. HARVEY. The Senator from Maine says that we should hold on to what we have got. Let us see what we have got if the amendment is adopted as it stands. We have got two lines running east and west through the northern section of the country, one line running from Philadelphia over the Philadelphia and Wilmington road by way of Baltimore to Washington, and then diagonally across one of the other fast lines to Chicago, making three lines to be picked out specially by legislation here and paid an extravagant rate of compensation for carrying the mails between certain points in a very small portion of the country, resulting, as I admitted at first, in some benefit to the people engaged in financial and commercial speculations.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the Senator wants to be correct, and certainly he is incorrect, will he allow me to correct him?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Department did not pay these fast-mail trains one more red cent than it paid any other mail-train anywhere else that went twenty miles an hour in my State, or that went twenty miles an hour in his State—not one mill more.

Mr. HARVEY. Does the Senator mean that this amendment as it stands pays them no more than other roads are to be paid?

Mr. HAMLIN. I mean that under the old law the fast-mail trains were paid no more than was paid other roads. They cannot perform the service with the 10 per cent. cut off, and now on these fast roads we propose to put the 10 per cent. back. I undertake to tell the Senator and the Senate that it is not proposed to pay them as much as they receive for carrying freight over these roads.

Mr. HARVEY. The proposition does not involve what was done under the old law as relates to this matter, because the old law made no provision for this fast-mail business. It was an experiment entered into by the Post-Office Department upon its own motion, as I understand it. If I may be pardoned the expression, it looks like dodging the question to say they are getting no more because you take 10 per cent. off the rest and then restore 10 per cent. so far as these particular lines are concerned.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator was speaking of what the Government had paid, and I simply said that it had not paid to these trains any more than it had paid to others.

Mr. HARVEY. I am speaking of what the Senator proposes in this amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. I propose in the amendment to pay the old rate, which is 10 per cent. more than the rate now paid.

Mr. HARVEY. And the 10 per cent. is cut off elsewhere.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, on twenty-five-miles-an-hour roads.

Mr. HARVEY. Elsewhere except on these few roads, picked out as by a special favor in a legislative act.

Mr. HAMLIN. They are great arteries of business.

Mr. HARVEY. O, yes; great arteries of business.

Mr. WEST. By reciprocal favor of service.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to make a suggestion to him? Does he not know that Chicago, speaking in regard to the roads west, is the great distributing office of the whole Northwest? It is the second office in the United States, and from that depot the mail matter goes to all the western country. More time is gained by having a fast mail from Chicago to New York than by having a fast mail from New York to any other place.

Mr. HARVEY. I will answer the Senator from Illinois. I know Chicago is a great city, and that the Chicago post-office is a great office and a good office; but I know that when you get a few miles away from Chicago, from the end of the line to which you propose to give this subsidy of 10 per cent. additional for carrying the mails at a little more brisk rate, the country is not benefited at all, because the connection is not continuous.

Mr. LOGAN. The country is benefited just twenty-four hours, or whatever number of hours is saved between Chicago and New York. The country receives that benefit because that time is taken off from all mails going west. They receive the mail just that number of hours sooner than they would otherwise receive it.

Mr. HARVEY. It so happens that we have had a little experience under this fast-mail line, and we know practically that so far as we are concerned in the interior of the country, in the very center of the continent, we got our mails no sooner than we did before. The parties who are benefited by this subsidy of 10 per cent. are the owners—probably that is saying too much—not the owners but the particular managers of these lines of railroad. In this day and age the owners of railroads often are not greatly benefited by subsidies that their roads receive, but the parties having the management of them are. I say they are benefited, and a few metropolitan newspapers are benefited, and two or three great cities are benefited, while the country at large pays the expense, while the country people can have no reasonable mail facilities afforded to them. When an effort is made in their behalf it does not meet the sanction of the Senate, and fails for that reason; yet some of us are ready it seems to vote for what is an essential subsidy of 10 per cent. above what other contractors for carrying the mails upon railroads receive in order that the mail may be carried in less time upon three lines crossing one another, as they do at one or more places and covering but a very small portion of the country, affording no additional facilities elsewhere.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. He says nobody is benefited except these great cities. Suppose that in the transmission of mercantile paper between New York and Chicago, on account of the saving of time, millions of dollars passing through the mails in that way, $500,000 of interest that would be charged each day on these credits is saved to the merchants; would not the merchants be able to afford sales to the people at just that much less throughout the whole length of the country? Do not the people pay all the taxes on the goods? Is not all the expense counted together, and do not the people who purchase pay it all? Then if this amount is saved by the merchant, cannot the merchant afford to sell just that much cheaper to the people?

Mr. HARVEY. The people pay the taxes levied upon the merchant for the exorbitant rates which are charged upon freight and expressage. They pay the tax levied by these very same persons upon the products of their farms, their factories, and their mines, and they are called upon now to pay $225,000 additional to afford these facilities to the people engaged in transporting back and forth and in the business of exchanging merchandise, while the benefit, as I say, so far as the masses of the people are concerned, amounts to nothing, for the reason that the speed given upon these few lines is lost by breakage of connection upon other lines before this mail matter reaches the mass of the people. We are called upon to subsidize three railroads running through one little corner of the country at an expense to the rest of the people of the United States of $225,000. That is what the proposition is.

Mr. LOGAN. I would state one other point to the Senator. The very cities that he complains of as being benefited, the cities of Chicago and New York——

Mr. HARVEY. I do not complain that they are benefited.

Mr. LOGAN. No, but one city which the Senator says is benefited, the city of Chicago, pays more revenue to the United States Government than any other district in the United States, and the record shows it. The Government is indebted more to that city for revenue of an internal character than to any other district in the United States of America, and more than all New England combined.

Mr. HARVEY. I have not said a word about Chicago.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas regrets that the people of the United States are to be taxed $225,000 more for carrying their mails. It is a very lamentable fact perhaps in his estimation that they are taxed at all. It is a very great misfortune in his estimation that they have to pay $30,000,000 a year for these mail facilities. But in their own estimation and in the estimation of the Senate there is no direction in which the money of the people is spent as much to their advantage as in sustaining the mail system of the Government.

Then he also regrets that some railroads are to get more than others. When the honorable Senator leaves this Chamber, as he will in a few days, he will have his selection of a route, and I ask him will he take a twenty-mile-per-hour train at $6 to New York, or will he take the limited express and expedite his business, and pay $10 and get through more expeditiously and more comfortably? So it is with the mail. We pay some companies so much for carrying it so fast; we pay others in proportion to the character of the service they render and the benefit they may be to the public.

But I want to say one word with reference to the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. HITCHCOCK.] It can only embarrass this question. He can have no expectation of seeing it enacted into a law, for the reason that it was put upon the post-office appropriation bill quite recently, was sustained by the Senate, but——

Mr. PADDOCK. My friend will allow me.

Mr. HARVEY. Will the Senator, before——

Mr. WEST. I cannot hear two at once. I yield to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to correct my friend from Louisiana in respect of the matter which he states. The amendment to which he refers was another amendment covering another subject, the question of the Sunday mail between Chicago and the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific road, and did not relate at all to the question of fast trains.

Mr. WEST. Will the Chair have the kindness to have the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] read.

Mr. PADDOCK. The amendment of which the Senator speaks ought to be incorporated in the bill, because it makes a difference of one day's service for all the trans-Missouri country, all the country between the Missouri River and the Pacific Ocean, and I understand that it will be offered by the honorable Senator from Iowa at the proper time.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. HITCHCOCK.

Mr. WEST. I ascertain that I did misconceive the scope of the amendment; but at the same time the Senator from Nebraska must be aware that if this proposition is embarrassed with extensions in all directions, they will weight it so down that it will be impossible to accomplish what we want. Now if the Senator from Kansas desires to ask me a question I will yield to him.

Mr. HARVEY. I wanted to ask whether the Senator supposes I object to appropriating money to the support of the Post-Office Department? I have stated repeatedly that I do not; but I want to see it appropriated in the interest of the people, and not in the interest of certain peculiar corporations or of a few classes. I want to see it made so that the people of the country can be equally benefited.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should certainly be unwilling to embarrass the passage of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine.

SUPPRESSION OF INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BURNSIDE.) The Chair asks indulgence to lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States which has just been received. It seems to be of importance.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a telegram of the 5th of August instant, from Lieutenant-General Sheridan to General Sherman, a letter of the 11th of the present month from General Sherman to the Secretary of War, and a letter from the latter, of the same date, to me, all setting forth the possible needs of the Army in consequence of existing hostilities.

I would strongly urge upon Congress the necessity for making some provision for a contingency which may arise during the vacation, for more troops in the Indian country than it is now possible to send.

It would seem to me to be much more economical and better to authorize an increase of the present cavalry force by twenty-five hundred privates, but, if this is not deemed advisable, then that the President be authorized to call out not exceeding five regiments, one thousand strong each, of volunteers, to serve for a period not exceeding six months.

Should this latter authority be given I would not order out any volunteers unless, in my opinion, based upon reports from the scene of war, I deemed it absolutely necessary, and then only the smallest number considered sufficient to meet the emergency.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 11, 1876.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, August 11, 1876.

The PRESIDENT:

I have the honor to transmit herewith the copy of a dispatch from Lieutenant-General P. H. Sheridan, dated the 5th instant, with a letter of this date from General Sherman, transmitting the same.

I desire to renew the expression of my opinion that the best way to re-enforce the troops now operating against the Indians will be to add the twenty-five hundred privates to the regiments already in existence; but, if Congress should not do this, then I advise that the President be authorized, in his discretion, to call for volunteers not to exceed five thousand in number.

I trust that Generals Terry and Crook may be able to deal such a blow to the hostile Indians that even this may not be necessary; yet prudence dictates that measures should be taken to meet all possible contingencies.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., August 11, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor herewith to transmit a copy of the dispatch of General Sheridan, of August 5, and invite your attention to the fact that after stripping nearly every post in his military division, except those in Texas and the South, he has only been able to re-enforce General Crook to the extent of seventeen hundred and seventy four and General Terry to eighteen hundred and seventy-three men for offensive operations.

He has also re-enforced the garrison along the Missouri River and at the agencies of Spotted Tail and Red Cloud so as to prevent their lending assistance to the hostile camps.

Inasmuch as Congress may soon adjourn, prudence dictates that we should be prepared for any possible contingency; and if it is not possible to obtain the increase of twenty-five hundred men asked for our cavalry regiments, I would most respectfully advise that the President be requested to ask authority to accept the services of five thousand volunteers for the period of six months or during hostilities, these volunteers to be accepted and mustered in from the States and Territories most convenient to the theater of operations.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

Hon. J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

A true copy:

CHICAGO, August 5, 1876.

General W. T. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

I have not yet been able to re-enforce the garrison at Red Cloud, at Spotted Tail, or at Standing Rock to be strong enough to attempt to count the Indians or to arrest and disarm those coming in. I beg of you to see the Military Committee of the House and urge on it the necessity of increasing the cavalry regiments to one hundred to each company.

General Crook's total strength is seventeen hundred and seventy-four, Terry's eighteen hundred and seventy-three, and to give this force to them I have stripped every post from the line of Manitoba to Texas. We want more mounted men. We have not exceeded the law in enlisting Indian scouts, in fact have not as many as the law allows us; the whole number in this division is only one hundred and fourteen. The Indians with General Crook are not enlisted or even paid. They are not worth paying; they are with him only to gratify their desire for a fight and their thirst for revenge on the Sioux.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the communications be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLICATION OF ARMY REGULATIONS.

Mr. LOGAN. Now while I am up I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be printed and lie on the table. It is a resolution in reference to Army matters.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 24) providing for the postponement of the publication of the Army Regulations.

The joint resolution was read at length, as follows:

Whereas the President was, by act of Congress approved March 1, 1875, authorized to make and publish regulations for the government of the Army in accordance with existing laws; and whereas by act of Congress approved July 24, 1876, a commission was created, to which has been referred the whole subject-matter of reform and re-organization of the Army of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the President be requested to postpone all action in connection with the publication of said regulations until after the report of said commission is received and acted on by Congress at its next session.

Mr. LOGAN. If there be no objection to that, I should like to have it passed; but if there is, I will ask that it be printed and lie on the table. It is a matter of some importance. It prevents the publication of regulations until the Army commission shall meet and examine the subject.

Mr. ALLISON. That ought to pass.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to have it passed without reference, if the Senate will permit.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was read three times, and passed.

THE POST-ROUTE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3628) establishing post-roads, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. HITCHCOCK to the amendment of Mr. HAMLIN.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was saying, Mr. President, when I was interrupted that I should be very sorry to embarrass the amendment of the Senator from Maine by any amendment which I should offer. I am very anxious, as anxious as any one can be, that we shall get something in return for the abandonment of the fast-mail train, so called. I am very willing and very glad, if we cannot get what we think we should have and what we want, to take what we can get; but it seems to me the Senator is a little inconsistent. He proposes to decrease the time for the carrying of the mails through the great center of this country by decreasing that time by giving us a fast mail on two routes from the East as far west as Chicago and then stopping. My proposition is by a small appropriation comparatively, $40,000, to give to that whole scope of country west of Chicago one day's shortening of time.

I cannot see why, great as Chicago is, Chicago should receive the benefit of two fast-mail trains from two different directions and that there that advantage should stop. I cannot see why Washington Territory, Oregon, and California, and Nevada, and Idaho, and Montana, and Colorado, and Utah, and Nebraska, and Kansas, and Iowa, and Dakota, and the whole vast country there, should not by the appropriation which I propose receive the advantage of one day in fast mails while the country east of that receives the advantage of a fast mail over two separate and distinct lines. It does seem to me that if economy is the purpose, we could economize by giving a fast mail over the one central line between New York and Chicago, and give a fast mail from Chicago for the five hundred miles which I propose. It seems to me that that appeals to the reason and judgment of the Senate and of the country; and while I am unwilling to embarrass the passage of the bill, I do think that I am entitled to a vote on the merits of the amendments I have proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Maine as amended.

Mr. BOGY. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. By the amendment now pending the northern line is provided for. While it is true that Chicago is the great distributing point for that whole northwestern country, yet it is also true that Saint Louis is a great distributing point for another great section of country; and the object of my amendment is to carry on this same line between Chicago and Saint Louis so as to extend the service on the northern fast line as provided in the amendment, by the way of Chicago to Saint Louis, leaving Chicago, however, to be what Chicago is, a great distributing point, but to carry on the mails that are not to be distributed at that point but are to be distributed at Saint Louis, down to Saint Louis by a fast train. I move to insert after the word "Chicago" the words:

And over the Alton, Chicago and Saint Louis Railroad to Saint Louis.

In that way Chicago will receive mail facilities directly from New York by the roads mentioned in the amendment of the Senator from Maine, also from Philadelphia through the Pennsylvania Central, and from Baltimore by the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, and Saint Louis will receive the same, and so will Cincinnati. Thus these three great points in the West will be placed exactly on the same footing as to facilities for the fast mail, and this will be attained by the adoption of my amendment, which is after "Chicago" to insert "and over the Alton, Chicago and Saint Louis Railroad to Saint Louis."

Mr. ALLISON. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he do not insert any particular railroad between Chicago and Saint Louis. I think there are two or three lines, and it might be that a better arrangement could be made with one of the other lines than the one he specifically mentions. Let it be open.

Mr. BOGY. I concur with the Senator and am willing to receive the suggestion. I thought of it myself and suggested to the Senator from Maine to make the same thing applicable to his whole amendment. In the appropriation there ought to be no roads mentioned, but we should leave the power with the Postmaster-General to make the best arrangement he can with any road between New York and Chicago, Chicago and Saint Louis, Philadelphia and these points. But the amendment having been matured by my friend from Maine, and as these railroads had made the contract, I thought it better not to make the change. I will, however, receive the suggestion of my friend from Iowa, for I think it is an improvement, and provide simply that the mails should be carried on to Saint Louis. The Clerk will put in the proper words.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no objection to the amendment in that form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to offer an amendment which I think ought to be adopted, not proposing a fast mail between Chicago and Omaha, but proposing an amendment which will authorize a daily mail between Chicago and Omaha.

Mr. HAMLIN. Do not connect it with this amendment; offer it afterward. I ask the Senator to offer it on its own merits.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I withdraw it for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, as amended, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HARVEY. I wish simply to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is the inauguration of a system of subsidies to favorite railroad lines.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not think that is worth replying to at this stage of the session.

Several SENATORS. Let the amendment be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $150,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury arising from the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, in addition to the sum appropriated for inland mail transportation by railroad by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," approved July 12, 1876: Provided, That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to only apply this sum in restoring, so far as it may be possible to do so, the transportation of the mails by fast-mail trains over the New York Central, and Hudson River, and Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroads between New York and Chicago and to Saint Louis, and over the Pennsylvania Railroad and its connections between New York and Saint Louis, New York and Chicago, and New York and Cincinnati.

SEC. 3. That to enable the Postmaster-General to arrange for fast-mail trains over the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, and over the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and its connections to Washington, Saint Louis, and Chicago, $75,000, to be paid out of the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1877.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Kernan, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Oglesby, Paddock, Randolph, Sargent, Wadleigh, Wallace, and West—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Cockrell, Cooper, Eaton, Edmunds, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, and Stevenson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Booth, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conover, Dorsey, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Morton, Patterson, Robertson, Sharon, Thurman, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—23.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have another amendment which I offer by direction of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

SEC. —. That from and after the passage of this act the bonds of all postmasters may, by direction of the Postmaster-General, be approved and accepted, and the approval and acceptance signed by the First Assistant Postmaster-General, in the place and stead of the Postmaster-General; and all contracts for stationery, wrapping-paper, letter-balances, scales, and street letter-boxes, for the use of the postal service, in like manner may be signed by the First Assistant Postmaster-General, in the place and stead of the Postmaster-General, and his signature shall be attested by the seal of the Post-Office Department.

SEC. —. That the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, on the order of the Postmaster-General, shall sign with his name, in the place and stead of the Postmaster-General, and attest his signature by the seal of the Post-Office Department, all contracts made in the said Department for mail transportation and for supplies of mail-bags, mail-catchers, mail-locks, and keys, and all other articles necessary and incident to mail transportation.

SEC. —. That the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, when directed by the Postmaster-General, shall sign with his name, in the place and stead of the Postmaster-General, all warrants on the Treasurer of the United States for the payment of money out of the Treasury for the use of the postal service; and shall also sign, in his name, in the place and stead of the Postmaster-General, and attest his signature by the seal of the Post-Office Department, all contracts for supplies of postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, newspaper-wrappers, postal cards, registered-package envelopes, locks, seals, and official envelopes for the use of postmasters, and return of dead letters, that may be required for the postal service.

Mr. WITHERS. I would ask the Senator from Maine to withdraw that amendment for a moment, in order that I may offer one in connection with the subject of fast-mail trains. This relates to a different matter entirely.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator state what he wants?

Mr. WITHERS. The amendment which I propose to offer, if the Senator permits me to offer it now, is to insert the following:

SEC. —. That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to contract for the transmission of a fast mail daily from Washington to New Orleans, via Richmond, Virginia; and that the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the performance of this service.

Mr. HAMLIN. That can come in afterward. All there is in this amendment is simply to authorize the several Assistant Postmasters-General to sign the proper papers that go from their several departments instead of compelling the Postmaster-General to do it. The Postmaster-General told me yesterday that he had been four days all the time continuously signing mail contracts and they did not emanate from him but emanated from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. This is simply to allow the various assistants to certify as the Postmaster-General has heretofore certified, leaving the Postmaster-General with his time to devote to the interests of the country and the Bureau officers to make the proper certificates. I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the last part of the amendment which relates to drawing money from the Treasury read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, when directed by the Postmaster-General, shall sign with his name, in the place and stead of the Postmaster-General, all warrants on the Treasurer of the United States for the payment of money out of the Treasury for the use of the postal service.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that is a good amendment, and I submit it to my friend from Maine. I think it departs from the universal history and custom of the Government, which has required all moneys drawn from the Treasury to be on the requisition of the heads of the Departments in respect of which they are to be applied, and I move to strike out that part of the amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think that rule is observed to a certain extent in the Treasury Department now; but it is of very slight importance compared with the two previous sections, which include the great amount of manual labor. I have, therefore, no objection to the Senator's motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS. Now I offer my amendment, to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC.—. That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to contract for the transmission of a fast mail daily from Washington to New Orleans, via Richmond, Virginia; and that the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the performance of this service.

I merely wish to state that as by the amendments to the bill which have already been adopted provision is made for three fast-mail trains from east to west, I think in carrying out the suggestion of the Senator from Maine who offered the original amendment it would be well enough to put in at least one provision extending these facilities and advantages to the southern communities and southern cities. We have now no mail facilities, scarcely those of an ordinary character even, and I think it would comport with the interests of the whole country as well as of that section to give us the benefit of one fast mail.

Mr. HAMLIN. In view of the routes for which this fast-mail service has already been provided I have only this to say, that I regard the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia as eminently proper and will give to it my vote.

Mr. BOGY. Before the vote is taken I will make a suggestion. I think it very likely so large an amount will not be necessary. I move, therefore, to insert after "dollars" the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary." I hope my friend will accept the suggestion.

Mr. WITHERS. I accept the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia will be so modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I offer the following amendment to come in as an additional section:

SEC. —. That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to contract for the daily transmission of mails between Chicago and the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad at a cost for extra service not exceeding $25,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is to Omaha in fact, is it not?

Mr. ALLISON. To Council Bluffs.

Mr. PADDOCK. I suggest to the Senator that he change it from "eastern terminus" to "Omaha."

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; I prefer not to do that, for the reason that I want to connect with the Union Pacific Railroad, and I do not know exactly where it commences.

Mr. PADDOCK. There is a little complication about the question of transfer there which might get in the way of the transportation of the mail.

Mr. ALLISON. I propose to get rid of that complication. I think the amendment had better be left as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator whether he has not already a daily mail between these two points? They are prominent points, and I take it there should be a daily mail there.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator from Virginia that there has been a daily mail between Chicago and the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad. That daily mail was arranged for by a contract of the Postmaster-General for the extra service, the Sunday service, so called, at the rate of $25,000 per annum; but under the post-office appropriation bill which was passed a few days ago from necessity that mail will be cut off, or at least there is danger of its being cut off unless provision is made for it, and therefore I move to insert the provision. It was in this post-office appropriation bill, but struck out by the committee of conference.

Mr. DAVIS. I see no special reason why a Sunday mail should be provided for a particular road. The other roads I believe run a Sunday mail and are paid by the weight of the mail. This is an extra compensation, independent of the regular pay for carrying the mail by the pound. Other roads run the Sunday mail without extra pay, and I see no reason why an extra provision should be made for a special road.

Mr. ALLISON. I will explain to the Senator from West Virginia. These railroads between Chicago and Omaha are only required to transport the mails six times a week, but there being three of them, they have arranged to carry one mail a week extra, alternating over the three roads; and therefore if this mail is continued they must receive some compensation for it. The Senator very well knows that these railways between Chicago and Omaha carry the great through mail between New York and San Francisco; and if they do not carry it daily, passengers and mails will be obliged to lay over at Chicago going westward and at Omaha coming eastward.

Mr. RANDOLPH. This is so much additional service, I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. It is additional service.

Mr. DAVIS. It is additional service in this way: It is additional to the regular pay paid to other roads. They are paid, as I understand, by the pound so much per mile, regulated by the weight carried. If this $25,000 extra is paid, it is an extra payment to this particular road over other roads. I believe I am right about that.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator does not seem to understand that these mails will go over these several roads six times a week unless this provision is made, and when this provision is made the mails will go seven times a week and connect with the Union Pacific Railway which starts from Omaha every morning in the year. Otherwise the mail will be obliged to lay over once a week twenty-four hours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the arrangement for the transmission of mails, as it stands under the bill and the amendments that have now been made to it, seems exclusively to favor what may be called the extreme northern line across the continent. We have provisions for the transmission of the mails from New York via the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern to Chicago, and thence across Iowa to the city of Omaha or Council Bluffs, there connecting with the Union Pacific Railroad.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The fast mail was not extended to Omaha.

Mr. INGALLS. A daily mail; the Senator is very technical. There is also provision for the transmission of a fast mail from Chicago to Saint Louis, and there it stops. By this arrangement, partial and incomplete and unsatisfactory as I believe it to be, the southwestern portion of the country is left entirely unaccommodated. It is not necessary for me to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that that portion of the country embraces a large part of the area of the State of Kansas, the Indian Territory, the State of Colorado, and the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico. It is, therefore, in my judgment, essential that, to prevent this partiality, the system should be continued still farther from Saint Louis to give that portion of the country the same advantages that are now received by the northern and northwestern portions of the country. I therefore propose the following amendment:

SEC. —. The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to contract for the transmission of fast mails between Saint Louis and Topeka, Kansas, and that the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the performance of this service.

The reason why I name the city of Topeka is because at that point the Kansas Pacific Railroad, extending directly west to the city of Denver, and the Atchison and Topeka Railroad, extending in a southwestern direction across the State of Kansas into Colorado to Pueblo, where it there connects with the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad, intersect, so that the mails arriving from Saint Louis can there be distributed upon both these great trunk lines. I think, sir, a mere statement of the necessities of that portion of the country will be sufficient to recommend this amendment to the favorable consideration of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I shall not undertake to take up the time of the Senate in arguing the question; but this is running the thing to that extreme degree which makes it an amendment that the Senate ought not to adopt.

Mr. INGALLS. When the Senator from Maine speaks about running it to an extreme that the Senate ought not to adopt, I beg him to correct his geography. The city of Topeka is but very little further west than the city of Omaha, and the provision that is made extends now to that city; and it certainly is no more than just that the advantages of this system should be extended westward from Saint Louis as well as from Chicago.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator's amendment would commend itself to my judgment with almost as much propriety if he had included some point in the Indian Territory beyond. It does not embrace that population nor does it furnish that amount of revenue which will justify what you call your fast mail, any more than every little remote inland office would demand a daily mail by star service. It has not been extended to Omaha, as the Senator supposes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I rose to correct the Senator in that respect.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will not take up the time of the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Unfortunately it was not extended to Omaha.

Mr. INGALLS. I submit the amendment to the consideration of the Senate, as I suppose I have a right to do.

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAXEY. I submit the following amendment:

That the Postmaster-General is authorized to contract for fast-mail service between the city of Saint Louis, Missouri, and Galveston, Texas.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope it will not be adopted. That is all I have to say.

Mr. MAXEY. The amendment already adopted carries this fast-mail service to Saint Louis. I think its extension to Texas is very important.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PADDOCK. I offer an amendment covering three additional sections.

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. —. That it shall be lawful to transmit through the mail, free of postage, any letters, packages, or other matters relating exclusively to the business of the Government of the United States: Provided, That every such letter or package to entitle it to pass free shall bear over the words "official business" an indorsement showing also the name of the Department, and, if from a bureau or office, the names of the Department and bureau or office, as the case may be, whence transmitted. And if any person shall make use of any such official envelope to avoid the payment of postage on his or her private letter, package, or other matter in the mail, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to a fine of $300, to be prosecuted in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. —. That for the purpose of carrying this act into effect, it shall be the duty of each of the Executive Departments of the United States to provide for itself and its subordinate offices the necessary envelopes; and, in addition to the indorsement designating the Department in which they are to be used, the penalty for the unlawful use of these envelopes shall be stated thereon.

SEC. —. That Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives may send and receive through the mail, free of postage, letters, documents, packages, and other matter relating exclusively to public business: Provided, That such Senator, Representative, or officer shall write upon each letter, document, or other matter so sent by him his name, with the proper designation of the office he holds; and the same penalty is prescribed for the violation of the provisions of this section as that provided in section 1 of this act for officers of the United States: Provided, That the penalty herein shall not be construed to interfere with the constitutional power of each House to punish or expel a member.

Mr. INGALLS. Before being called upon to vote on this proposition I should be glad to have some explanation of the practical effect of it, not being able to derive that from the cursory reading of the Clerk.

Mr. ALLISON. Perhaps it had better be read again for the information of the Senator.

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator desires, the amendment can be read again. I will state that this amendment was prepared by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and I was instructed by that committee to report it as an independent measure. I did so, but on consultation with the committee it was agreed that I should offer the bill, as it was drawn and perfected by the committee, as an amendment to this bill. I did not purpose to advocate the passage of the measure. If the measure in its provisions does not commend itself to the Senate, I do not care to waste its time in the discussion of it.

It is a very carefully guarded bill. The first section does away with the present very pernicious system of official franks through and by which great abuses come and great expense comes. The other provisions are plain and simple. I believe it is true that all who did ever enjoy the franking privilege under the old laws do now enjoy it under a more expensive system except Senators and Members of Congress, who are required in all correspondence on public business to pay their own postage; and I consider that it is quite as important, quite as essential that the representatives of the people who are in constant and continued correspondence with them, attending to their business, should have free communication with them and with the Executive Departments concerning their business, and that the people should have free communication with them.

Whatever may be done by the State Department in the performance of the duties devolving upon the Secretary of State, whatever information he may obtain for the use of the people in connection with the performance of his duties, whatever may be done by the Treasury Department, and whatever information may be gained in the performance of those duties by the officers thereof respecting commerce, finance, revenue, the tariff, or other subjects and matters in charge of that Department, and so with the Interior, the War, the Navy, and all other Departments of Government ought to be given freely to the people. This can only be done by giving to Senators and Members of Congress the authority to distribute such information when printed to their constituents without expense for postage; the burden otherwise would be too grievous to be borne. There are very many considerations that may be urged in favor of the passage of this measure; but, sir, I do not now propose to spend any further time in discussing it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to ask the Senator if this franking privilege extends to documents published by Congress?

Mr. PADDOCK. It extends no further than to cover all matters relating to public business. It covers nothing of personal letters or personal packages of any character whatever.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does it cover all documents published by authority of Congress?

Mr. PADDOCK. Yes, sir. Whatever there is of information which the Government through its Executive Departments proposes to give to the people, that goes free. Whatever business may be required to be done through communications between Senators and Members and their constituents, that which relates exclusively and only to public business is to go free.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As far as I am concerned I would prefer that the franking privilege should not extend to letters of any character. A difficulty will arise very frequently and men will inadvertently, if they have the privilege of franking certain letters, without thought and casually, perhaps without design, violate the law and put their frank on private correspondence. If it applied simply to the documents published by the authority of Congress, without applying to correspondence, I would be for it.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator from Delaware has the privilege of offering an amendment. I am not at all tenacious of any provisions of this amendment except those which are most carefully guarded.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am in favor of sending out, under the frank of members of Congress, every document published by the authority of Congress for the information of the people; and I am in favor of sending out those matters from the Agricultural Department, such as seeds, &c., which are furnished by the Commissioner to members of Congress to be distributed to their constituents. But I see that a difficulty must arise if the franking privilege is extended to official communications apart from private communications of individuals, because by inadvertence there will be numerous violations of law. I would prefer to pay the postage upon my official correspondence with my constituents rather than to run the risk of violating in a single instance the law, and placing my frank upon a private letter which was not official. I would therefore suggest an amendment of that kind.

Mr. PADDOCK. Let the Senator prepare his amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, franking is miscalled a privilege. It never was a privilege. It is a burden that has always been felt as such by every person who was ever called upon to exercise it, or who ever had the opportunity of enjoying it. Its repeal, however, in my judgment, was an act of timidity, if not of cowardice, that never was called for by the country and has never been justified or sanctioned by the American people. Ever since that repeal was made, there has been an effort by indirection and by timidity and by moving a step here and a step there to get back again to the same position that was occupied before the repeal was made. I see in the amendment that is now proposed by the Senator from Nebraska one other effort apparently in the same direction. Everybody knows that the ultimate result of these proceedings is to be that franking will be restored. So far as I am concerned, I am entirely willing to vote to restore it to-day in all its full proportions, unshorn and unlimited, and I should very much prefer to vote for that than to be called upon session after session to vote here a little and there a little, now to frank turnip seed and then to frank pumpkin seed, and next session to frank an Agricultural Report and then a piece of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and now to frank official communications. I think that if we intend to restore the franking burden, not the franking privilege, we had better proceed like men to do it and do it without delay, and do it frankly.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, if there are abuses in the system of franks that exist now they ought to be corrected. I could not hear distinctly the provision in regard to franks used by departmental officers, but by the present law Members and Senators can frank the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the Agricultural Report. In my judgment we should not pass this provision and give a frank for all printed matter and all letters written on public business or relating to anything else. I do not desire to argue it; but my judgment is very strong that it is not a thing that we should do. There is some allowance made to us out of the Treasury for stationery, &c., and beyond that, if we cannot do otherwise, we can send the documents as freight, and distribute them in that way. I think it would be a bad precedent to commence to restore franking in this way. I hope the provision will not be adopted.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Senator from New York that it costs me from $25 to $30 a hundred pounds to send documents as freight from here to my residence or to any one of my constituents. For one I cannot stand that.

Mr. KERNAN. I suppose that where there are documents that parties want, it is no trouble if a member finds they desire them to send them subject to the charge to be paid on delivery.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then my constituents would have to pay.

Mr. KERNAN. I think there was so much dissatisfaction existing with the franking before that we should not take small steps toward restoring it, but leave the law stand as it is.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York if he has observed that the existing law which authorizes the franking of a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has had the effect to swell that volume to undue proportions?

Mr. KERNAN. My observation is that under any system it is swelled to very large proportions. I do not think that has caused it to be increased.

Mr. DAWES. To do that by legislative enactment which tends directly to fill it with matter which would not otherwise go there, merely for the purpose of getting the benefit of franking, seems to me to be not only doing by indirection what we have hardly courage enough, as the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] says, to do by direction, but to be paying for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD every year very much that we would not pay for were it not for the fact that we desire to seek the benefit of the franking privilege.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if that does not result from another House authorizing speeches to be printed that never were delivered at all?

Mr. DAWES. The other House, I know, authorizes the printing of speeches that are never delivered at all; and this House authorizes anybody, by merely requesting leave, to put in the RECORD anything that it seems to him or to us would be a desirable thing to frank to our constituents. It is an occurrence of every day.

I have voted for the abolition of the franking privilege time and again, a dozen times I think; I have voted for it every time it has been up for the last twenty years; I have voted for it with the firm conviction that it was an unwise thing to repeal it; but the metropolitan press of the country set about the work of aggrandizement and of bringing all methods of the distribution of information in this country under its own control. It established agencies here; it availed itself of the telegraph; it condensed the information to be distributed about the country and had it brought to its own establishments; and in that way it brought the press of the country step by step under its own control. It was necessary to complete that work to prevent the distribution as much as possible freely through the mails of information from this center by other means. Through that press working upon the country press and making them believe that this was the privilege of the representative in Congress, and through that country press making the people come to believe it, there was a public sentiment created that could be met in no other way, in my opinion, but by experience. I was governed in voting for the repeal of the franking privilege by the wish to have it demonstrated to the people that it was their privilege, and that its repeal was their loss. It was the aggrandizement of a few central papers at their expense through the country press. Sir, from the day it was repealed this sentiment has been becoming more and more to be established in the country that it was a mistake of the people; that they were misled in this view of the case. I know the country press had no idea when the bill passed the House of Representatives absolutely abolishing the franking privilege, so that no matter should go free through the mail, that it was going to cut off a privilege that they had enjoyed for twenty years of distributing their papers through their own counties free in the mail. I remember a leading editor in my own district writing me a very strong letter when I was in the other House urging me to go for the abolition of the franking privilege, and I had the satisfaction of writing him that I had just recorded my vote upon a bill that would require him to pay postage on all his papers throughout the county as well as on all the letters that he sent to me. He was utterly astonished. He wrote back that he did not desire any such thing as that; he desired to have his papers go free through the mail; he only wished to have the privilege members of Congress had enjoyed so long abolished, so that they should pay for what they sent through the mail. I only speak of that as an illustration of the common sentiment in the country.

Now, sir, I believe that the people understand this thing, and I believe that they see more and more the necessity, if they desire to obtain correct information from this center of what is going on here, of not depending solely upon the disposition and character of a few gentlemen, sitting up in the gallery over your head, however honorable they may be. They color, they shape, they determine how much of the information transmitted from here shall go throughout the country, and it should not be so. A Member of Congress or a Senator should have the opportunity of availing himself of the mails of the country to let the country know what is being done here, and not depend upon these gentlemen who are themselves depending upon a power behind that pays them and controls them, and, I am sorry to say, in many instances shapes and colors the very dispatches they send. The only cure for it is to create every possible facility for sending at the least possible expense from here and the least possible burden to those who send it all manner of information that people desire.

It so happens that the raid made upon the franking privilege which emanated from the Post-Office Department some five or six years ago and resulted in the passage of the law taking it away has been shown time and again to bring no possible relief to the burdens and expenditures of the Post-Office Department. To-day they are as large and larger than they were before this franking privilege was abolished. They were so the very next year. You could not discover certainly in any diminution of the cost of transporting the mails the fact, and you had to depend solely on the information which was constantly kept before the public that this privilege had been abolished; and every attempt here to facilitate the distribution of valuable information in the form of public documents or any other way is spied out first by this same metropolitan press and the alarm is given that it will lead to a restoration of that condition of things when the public will be relieved of the control by that press of the information that they receive. That press, seeing that this control is to be infringed upon and done away with, sounds the alarm. They have sounded it this past winter. Nobody else is heard to cry out or complain; you hear it from no other quarters but from these centers, and it is quite evident to me that the people see now what the purpose and object of it was in the beginning and what the effect of it is to be.

I am ready myself to vote for a restoration of the franking privilege. When I voted to repeal it I publicly avowed in the House of Representatives that it was my purpose, if possible, to make it a school-master to demonstrate to the people that in this particular they had been deluded, and that no relief to the public burden would come from it. And that no relief has come from it is quite apparent to everybody else but to this particular interest that is so seriously and constantly, and it seems to me for a very good reason, opposed to its restoration.

Mr. MAXEY. When the franking privilege was repealed I was not a member of the Senate but was a private citizen of the State of Texas, and I regarded it as extremely unwise. Experience since has confirmed me in that opinion. As far as I know or have reason to believe, in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, no one lives there but who is in favor of the restoration of the franking privilege. I am in favor of it because it is a measure directly in the interest of the people. It is a matter which concerns the people more than it does the member of Congress. The people are to-day earnestly and anxiously looking to the Congress of the United States, and they want to know the truth in regard to what is going on here. The exact truth they will get through the official documents, and when they get those official documents they will determine whether or not those they have sent here are faithfully discharging their duty or otherwise. I believe that every member of Congress should be held responsible, whether he be a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives, directly to the people he represents for his official action, and in order to get that certainly and beyond question they must resort to the RECORD.

I believe that, so far as all the various Departments of the Government are concerned which are required to make their reports to Congress, what is done by those Departments should be also known to the people, and I do know from actual personal knowledge that there is a demand and I might say a crying demand on the part of the people throughout the country to hear the truth in regard to what is going on in the administration of the Government in all its various Departments. So believing, and believing that it is in the interest of the people that this privilege be restored, that it is a privilege directly in the interest of the people, I have favored it.

But the Senator from New York says that these documents can be sent by express. Why, Mr. President, many of us represent portions of the country where there are no express-offices, where it is impossible to reach the people by express. The only means we have of sending these documents to the extreme outposts of the American Union is through the mails; and those of us who have endeavored to do our duty, to distribute all the documents which have been assigned to us, know perfectly well the great expense it involves. It is a serions expense to a member of Congress to do what? To do what the people want him to do; and my experience of the people is that no honest man wants another to pay for his convenience. The people of the country do not want a member of Congress to pay out of his own pocket that which is for their benefit. The allowance which is made to a member of Congress is made for his services, and there is no more reason why the postage which is required to pay for the distribution of documents should be paid out of his pocket than there is that the blacksmith's bill or any other bill of the people should be paid out of his pocket. That is the view I have of that matter.

Another thing. Unless the franking privilege is restored as it was, your plan of printing public documents ought to be abolished. There is no good sound sense or reason in filling the document room with documents, published at the expense of the people, and letting them lie there to rot. If you print these documents, circulate them; circulate them under the franking privilege, because the people want them for their benefit; and as the people do want them, they are willing to pay for them.

In an official communication sent to the Post-Office Committee of the Senate, of which the Presiding Officer is a member as well as myself, the Postmaster-General stated that there would be no additional expense to the country by reason of the restoration of this privilege. Then why, I ask, should it not be restored? It seems to me that wisdom and sound policy require it. It may not be of so much importance to those who live in the densely-settled parts of the country where they have the benefit of railroads and expresses; but to those who are settling up new States it is a matter of the greatest importance. I hold that the object of the post-office establishment was the dissemination of intelligence for the benefit of the people, and that it is but right to give the people the means of knowing exactly what is going on not only in the legislative department of the Government, but in all the various branches of the executive department which are required to make their reports here.

For these reasons, which are satisfactory to me, I have favored the restoration of the franking privilege as embodied in the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

About the point made by the Senator from Delaware in regard to letters I care nothing. If it may be that fraud might be practiced by reason of letters being sent under the franking privilege which did not concern the public business; if there can be no means of preventing fraud of that kind, then I say I care nothing about letters one way or the other; but as to the distribution of documents, I do believe it ought to be done under the franking privilege.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, my experience is different from that of the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Texas. There was satisfaction expressed generally, especially where I live, when the franking privilege was repealed. The old plan was thought to be a great expense upon the mass of the great body of the people for the few comparatively who receive documents. But my own experience ought not to have much weight. Have there been any petitions presented to either House of Congress that any man knows of, praying for the restoration of this privilege in any degree? I have not heard of them if there have been any. I have heard no complaint at home, but on the contrary satisfaction. Therefore, I had supposed that the community were quite well satisfied when there can be sent to them the largest book printed here for ten cents when franked, when there can be sent to them daily free under a frank the RECORD of the proceedings of Congress, when the printed matter which goes from Departments can be sent to them at two cents a pound by mail. Now, if everybody in the community could have one of these documents I should say let the people pay the expense of carrying them free; but that is not so. No gentleman believes we can print here matter enough to send to any considerable number of our constituents. It is only a few who will receive them, and I think those few can well afford to have them go with the postage as now regulated by law.

I do not want to argue the question, but I do not think gentlemen are correct. There have been no petitions indicating that anybody asks for a restoration of the franking privilege in any degree, so far as I know.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York if on the other hand during all the winter, all the summer, when the press have been speaking of this partial restoration, the bill itself having been published generally throughout the country months ago, he has heard any criticism upon it. I have failed to see any.

Mr. KERNAN. I do not remember that I have; but I do not think that is a very great guide. Our people, if they wanted this matter sent them free, would ask for it. After the strong expression of public sentiment against this privilege before it was repealed, I think we might wait until we got a petition from some quarter asking us to restore it.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will say to the Senator from New York that, so far as my own people are concerned, I have had innumerable letters advising and recommending it, and indorsing the position I had taken in respect to the matter, and no newspaper in my State up to this time of either party has criticised it.

Mr. KERNAN. I have heard none of my constituents suggest it, though I have been sending to them through the mail and otherwise such documents as I could get. The Senator from Massachusetts says that they do not get accurate information. No franking privilege will give the people that information which they desire to get and do get every day in almost every village in this country through the telegraph—a synopsis of the proceedings here. This information comes far behind that, and that they want any way.

I do not desire to seek to argue this question with any earnestness. My own settled judgment is that it is wiser and better to leave this matter to be subject to the light postage it now is, the Agricultural Report to be sent free and the daily RECORD to be sent free.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not understand the object of the last provision of the amendment that it shall not repeal the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. The right to expel a member is one of the "inalienable rights" I suppose.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not suppose it is necessary to provide that one of our acts shall not repeal that power.

Mr. PADDOCK. That was my opinion when the matter was considered in the committee, but it was suggested by some member of the committee that it would be well to put that on by way of precaution, and so it was done.

Mr. HOWE. I suppose this particular clause to which the Senator from New Jersey calls attention—my attention had not been attracted to it before—is to confer on the majority of the Senate the right to expel. Otherwise some might hold that only two-thirds could do it.

Mr. DAWES. That provision arose about the time that a distinguished member of the judiciary decided that an act of Congress had been passed which had taken from each House the right to punish for contempt. That was the way it came in this bill. It is due to the truth of history that it should be known that that was the reason, because of a distinguished legal opinion that was spread on the records of Congress.

Mr. HOWE. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to the gratitude of the Republic for putting that piece of history on the record. I rose, Mr. President, to suggest and to move an amendment to the pending amendment. In line 4 of the third section I propose to insert the conjunction "and" between "letters and documents," and to strike out the words following "documents" to and including "business."

The transmission of letters and documents to and from the representatives of the people seems to me to be the only privilege worth securing to the people. The transmission of packages seems to me to be too general a term to include in the bill, and then I think it of the utmost importance that you exclude from the bill this provision which always upon every letter and every document raises the question whether it does or does not relate exclusively to public business.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that if I was alone responsible for this measure I should accept his amendment readily, because I believe it to be a very correct one; but as I am not alone responsible for it, but only one of a committee which adopted the measure in its present form, I cannot accept his amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I will nevertheless submit the motion and take the judgment of the Senate upon it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suggest to the Senator that the word "packages" is unnecessary for the purpose of covering, as some one has suggested, seeds to be sent over the country, because there is a special act in reference to them.

Mr. HOWE. They are already provided for by existing law. With this amendment I will vote for the proposition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And strike out the last proviso.

Mr. HOWE. I should vote to strike that out, but I do not think it will injure the Constitution much if we leave it in; and with the amendment I have suggested I think I should be willing to vote for the measure. I am a good deal like my friend from Massachusetts; that is to say, my record on this subject is a good deal like his. He says he voted for the abolition of the franking privilege for a good many years and very steadfastly. I did likewise. I was a little more sincere in my devotion to that cause than he says he was. I really wanted to get rid of the burden of franking my letters and the documents and the newspapers and the speeches and the hundreds of tons of information which I sent from year to year over the country. I preferred very much to pay the postage on my letters and on everything that I wanted to send to the people of the United States and everything that the people wanted me to send to them. I thought it was not "millions" in my pocket, as our friend Colonel Sellers would express it, but I thought it was money in my pocket to abolish this business of franking, and I voted for its abolition. I thought that when my constituents wrote to me on their business they would send me the means of paying the postage on letters in return, and I thought some means would be invented for sending those documents which are published, which we all send to the people through the mails, without burden to the constituents and without burden to the members of Congress. But we have contrived to put the law into such a confused state that I think the public do not really know whether we have the franking privilege or not. We frank every day more or less, and I do not think the people understand where the right to frank exists and where it ceases, so that almost no one who writes to a member of Congress on business of his own, no matter how expensive the return may be to the member here, thinks of inclosing the postage. It is very rarely the case in my experience.

Then there is another difficulty. You have put down the postage on your public documents to that very low figure which will not excuse you from sending them through the mail, and will not excuse you from taking the postage even if it is sent to you. Therefore you send your documents off. You have got to frank them, and you have got to pay ten cents a volume on them; and that is an additional charge. All the labor of the old system is left on the Senator or Representative, and a great deal of additional cost is imposed upon him.

Mr. President, if the people can afford to trust me with the frank on documents and on letters, I am willing to assume that responsibility. I do not want any inquiry framed, any issue made; I do not want to be summoned before a jury of my country or a committee of investigation to settle the question whether the letter I frank or the document that I send off absolutely and on the whole relates to public business. I want to be trusted so far as that is concerned. It would require a jury of experts undoubtedly in a great many instances to determine a question of that sort, and it would be extremely difficult to try it. Therefore, I think we had better not open that question. I believe the people of Wisconsin will trust me to that extent, and if they will not I know they can find a man in the State whom they will trust; so I would exclude it from this bill. I will vote for the measure and take the responsibility. I would a great deal rather pay the money when we send off the document. Then I know exactly how much it costs me and the whole controversy is settled. There is no penalty about it; there is no investigation about it. That is a clean transaction; I am out of pocket so much, and have done so much labor, and there is the end of it. When I cannot afford to pay the money and to do the work any longer, I know a very easy way of avoiding both.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am placed in an awkward predicament here by the action of two honorable Senators. In the first place, I had determined to say a few words upon this measure and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] made precisely the speech which I had intended to make. In the next place, I had marked this proposition for an amendment, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] offered precisely the same amendment before I had an opportunity to offer it. I therefore conclude that both the Senators must be right, as they both agree with me. They are right at least to that extent; but perhaps I differ somewhat with the Senator from Wisconsin. I shall vote for the bill if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin is adopted. I have always believed that the abolition of the franking privilege was a piece of demagogism. I believe it still. No matter from where it originated, it was a privilege that belonged to the people and not to Senators and Representatives. It operated for their benefit and not for ours. I will suggest, however, a little alteration in the phraseolgy of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. Instead of saying "to and from the representatives of the people," I would say "to and from such representatives." I hope the Senator will accept that amendment, and I shall vote for it and for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK,] which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed in line 4 of the third section of the amendment, after the word "letters," to insert the word "and;" and to strike out in lines 4 and 5 the words "packages and other matter relating exclusively to public business."

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] suggests to me, and he is perfectly right, that if the amendment to the amendment should be agreed to by the Senate, there are some words in the seventh line which will have to be stricken out in order to make it conform.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment as it would read if amended.

The Chief Clerk read the third section, as follows:

That Senators, Representatives, and Delegates from Territories, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives may send and receive through the mail free of postage letters and documents: Provided, That such Senator, Represenative, or officer shall write upon each letter and document so sent by him his name, with the proper designation of the office he holds.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Allow me to suggest that the amendment would read better to insert "to and from such Senators, Representatives, and Delegates" after "documents."

Mr. HOWE. I think those words are not required there, if the Senator will read the section down.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The amendment to the amendment then is well enough as it is.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether he thinks the word "documents" would cover all matter published by authority of Congress; for instance, the books published by authority of Congress, and the bills published?

Mr. HOWE. That is my understanding of the term.

Mr. OGLESBY. As this has been fixed up now and is a good thing, I suppose, as it is now to be voted on, I should like to hear it read, so that if it is going to pass I may have a little share in it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let us take the question on the amendment to the amendment first.

Mr. OGLESBY. I want to see how it is proposed to be amended. I stepped out of the Chamber a few moments and do not know exactly what condition it is in.

Mr. HOWE. Let the Clerk read the last section.

Mr. OGLESBY. The last section, I suppose, is what ought to be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The third section, as proposed to be amended, reads:

That Senators, Representatives, and Delegates from Territories, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives may send and receive through the mail, free of postage, letters and documents: Provided, That such Senator, Representative, or officer shall write upon each letter and document so sent by him his name, with the proper designation of the office he holds.

Mr. OGLESBY. That is very plain and easily understood.

Mr. ANTHONY. The word "document" is a very indefinite term, it seems to me.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words, and but a very few words on this question. I voted to abolish the franking privilege. Its abolition was accomplished under a public clamor which, in my judgment, was as distant as it could be in the world from what was the public judgment. I was influenced, however, myself, I believe, in no degree by that clamor. Two reasons controlled my vote; one was a belief that I would avoid the necessity of answering every letter which I received inquiring of me particularly what was the health of Mrs. Grundy at that immediate time or some other matter of about as much importance. Having established the custom of answering every letter and maintaining it to that time, however important or unimportant, I found an enormous correspondence upon my hands. I think my length of time here led to a vastly larger correspondence from my own State than there would otherwise have been. That was one reason which led me to believe that if I voted to abolish the system if any person wanted to know whether Mrs. Grundy was well or ill, he would have the courtesy to inclose a return postage-stamp. But this is not done. I was therefore disappointed in that to some degree, though not entirely. I am satisfied that it has diminished many of my letters, for many of that description which had been written when there was no imposition of postage upon a Senator were not written after the abolition. I was therefore not entirely disappointed in that view of the case.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee if he ever received any letters inquiring about Mrs. Grundy which were paid for with official stamps?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will state that before I get through. The second reason which I had for voting for the repeal was that I did believe that it would cause a very large saving in the expenditures for public printing. I thought so then; I think so now. In that, however, I have been disappointed very much. It did not produce that diminution in the expenses of public printing which I expected and had a right to expect. Still, I think the restoration of it will bring us back to a very largely increased amount of public printing, and for that reason, and that alone, I shall vote against the bill.

I had besides another reason, for I am making a frank confession now. It was to be rid of the great labor of franking the very large number of documents, hardly worth the trouble and expense of sending, to be distributed over my State.

Those were the considerations which induced me to vote for that bill. There is but little left except the public printing, and I think now we shall find that again swelling upon us in enormons proportions if we restore the franking privilege.

Mr. DAWES. Can the Senator call to mind a single item of public printing that we have omitted to order because we could not send out documents free?

Mr. HAMLIN. I think we have omitted not many, but have diminished very largely the number. You will increase, in my judgment, both the number and the different descriptions of documents printed by making them all go free.

In relation to the first and second sections of this amendment, I want to say that they are, in my judgment, eminently just and will bring a large saving to the country. There were undoubtedly abuses under the old franking privilege, but in my judgment the abuses were entirely insignificant when compared and contrasted with the abuses that exist under it to-day. Do Senators know that all Government officials are furnished with stamps for official correspondence? They are; and I know, if other Senators do not, that not a week has transpired during this session of Congress in which I have not received communications with official stamps, relating only to private business. That would be my construction. I ought, however, in justice to the persons using them, to say that they might have drawn a different construction. A postmaster writes me in relation to some personal matter of his. I cannot conceive that it is thereby official, but it is done, and done very frequently. Your franking privilege formerly was confined only and exclusively to members of Congress and the persons enumerated, the President, the Vice-President, an Ex-President, and a few others, and the abuse was very slight indeed, while to-day, with 60,000 people in this country using a frank, if they use it honestly and only abuse it in the manner I have suggested, by using it when they think it applies to official matter but does not, you have an amount of deficiency in the revenue in consequence of that method beyond what ever could or ever did arise from the franking privilege as it existed and was exercised by members of Congress. That is my judgment.

These two sections provide what? That the Government, instead of purchasing stamps, would make the saving, first, in the amount that it would cost the Government to purchase its stamps. I do not mean the value, for when you come to that it is taking the money simply out of one pocket and putting it into the other, no more and no less; but if you abolish the stamp you do save to the Government beyond a doubt all that it costs mechanically to manufacture the stamp. There is that actual saving in the first and second sections of the amendment. If this should become a law, it would allow the various Departments to send their official communications through the mails, and then at the end of the year I hold that it would be the duty of Congress to make an annual appropriation to pay what is a fair compensation for the use which the Government has of the mails. This amendment provides that it shall be done under an envelope with a printed formula thereon, making it penal to counterfeit that, precisely as it was penal to counterfeit or to use a stamp. There is, therefore, just the same safety, and, as my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] suggests, these official envelopes will not get out of the possession, as little stamps could, would, and did. It is therefore economy to the Government to adopt the first and second sections of the amendment, and I rose only to state the reasons which would induce me to vote against the third section.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Do I understand that all of the third section after the word "holds" in the eighth line is stricken out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suggest, and I trust the Senator from Wisconsin will add that to his amendment, to strike out all after the word "holds" in the eighth line.

Mr. HOWE. I would not strike it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin modify his amendment?

Mr. HOWE. No, I do not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK,] as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the question is put, would the Chair be kind enough to have exactly the thing read which we are called to vote upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the whole amendment as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be lawful to transmit through the mail, free of postage, any letters, packages, or other matters relating exclusively to the business of the Government of the United States: Provided, That every such letter or package to entitle it to pass free shall bear over the words "official business" an indorsement showing also the name of the Department, and, if from a bureau or office, the names of the Department and bureau or office, as the case may be, whence transmitted. And if any person shall make use of any such official envelope to avoid the payment of postage on his or her private letter, package, or other matter in the mail, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of $300, to be prosecuted in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. That, for the purpose of carrying this act into effect, it shall be the duty of each of the Exective Departments of the United States to provide for itself and its subordinate offices the necessary envelopes, and, in addition to the endorsement designating the Department in which they are to be used, the penalty for the unlawful use of these envelopes shall be stated thereon.

SEC. 3. That Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives may send and receive through the mail, free of postage, letters and documents: Provided, That such Senator, Representative, or officer shall write upon each letter and document so sent by him his name, with the proper designation of the office he holds; and the same penalty is prescribed for the violation of the provisions of this section as that provided in section 1 of this act for officers of the United States: Provided, That the penalty herein shall not be construed to interfere with the constitutional power of each House to punish or expel a member.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out the last proviso about interfering with the rights to expel a member. It is quite unnecessary.

Mr. PADDOCK. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this amendment to the amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator accepts it, he having it in his control.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not under the Senator's control, having been amended, but the Chair hears no objection and the amendment to the amendment will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. The last section provides that—

The same penalty is prescribed for the violation of the provisions of this section as that provided in section 1 of this act for officers of the United States.

Section 1 provides that—

If any person shall make use of any such official envelope to avoid the payment of postage on his or her private letter, package, or other matter in the mail, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, &c.

I should like to know what would be a violation of the provisions of this first section.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know any; and so it does not do any hurt.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to move to strike those words out. It certainly does not make sense the way it is now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as amended, and the roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to state that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] and the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] are engaged in a conference and have paired upon this bill. The Senator from Massachusetts would vote in the negative, and the Senator from California in the affirmative.

The roll-call was concluded and the result was announced—yeas 30, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Burnside, Christiancy, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Key, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Spencer, Stevenson, Wallace, West, and Withers—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bogy, Booth, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Cockrell, Ferry, Hamlin, Kernan, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Morrill, and Oglesby—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conkling, Conover, Dorsey, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Morton, Robertson, Sargent, Sharon, Sherman, Thurman, Wadleigh, Whyte, Windom, and Wright—26.

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. NORWOOD. Is it too late to offer an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment is in order.

Mr. NORWOOD. I move to amend by inserting the word "Delegate" after the word "Representative," in the sixth line of section 3 of the amendment just agreed to; so as to make that part of the clause conform to the preceding part.

Mr. HARVEY. Is the motion now to concur in the amendments in gross?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is; but the vote can be taken separately upon any amendment, if the Senator desires.

Mr. HARVEY. I ask to reserve the amendment making appropriations to certain railroads for carrying what is known as the fast mail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be excepted. The Senator from Georgia proposes an amendment.

Mr. NORWOOD. Section 3 of the amendment provides for Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, and in the proviso, in the sixth line, the word "Delegate" is omitted. I wish simply to supply that omission, so as to read:

Provided, That such Senator, Representative, Delegate, or officer shall write upon each letter and document so sent by him, his name, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska which was adopted, "the same penalty is prescribed for the violation of the provisions of this section as that provided in section 1 of this act for officers of the United States." The first section of the bill relates to post-routes, and I do not know that any penalty is there. I ask the Senator who introduced the amendment to make the correction.

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment should be section —.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the text be corrected. It means the first section of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and that correction will be made.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to renew the amendment which I offered in committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole first.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that there are one or two words in the amendment that seem to fall foul of the Revised Statutes about saying "his or her." The Revised Statutes provide in all cases of law that it is unnecessary to name the sex; the word "his" covers everybody. Therefore, as a mere matter of legal phraseology, I suggest that he strike out the words "or her" where some penalty is provided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be done by unanimous consent. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARVEY] reserves the amendment in regard to fast trains. The question is on concurring in the other amendments in gross.

Mr. HARVEY. If in order, I call for the reading of the amendment making an appropriation for the fast-mail trains.

Mr. PADDOCK. Let us dispose of the other amendments first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This being the first amendment, it will be considered first. The Secretary will report it.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, inserted as sections 2, 3, and 4 of the bill the following:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $150,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury arising from the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, in addition to the sum appropriated for inland-mail transportation by railroad by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, and for other purposes," approved July 12, 1876: Provided, That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to only apply this sum in restoring, so far as it may be possible to do so, the transportation of the mails by fast-mail trains over the New York Central, and Hudson River, and Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroads, between New York and Chicago, and to Saint Louis, and over the Pennsylvania Railroad and its connections between New York and Saint Louis, New York and Chicago, and New York and Cincinnati.

SEC. 3. That to enable the Postmaster-General to arrange for fast-mail trains over the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad, and over the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and its connections to Washington, Saint Louis, and Chicago, $75,000, to be paid out of the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877; and that the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to contract for the transmission of fast mails daily from Washington to New Orleans via Richmond, Virginia; and that the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the revenues of the Post-Office Department for the performance of this service.

SEC. 4. That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to contract for the daily transmission of mails between Chicago and the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad at a cost for extra service not exceeding $25,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. HARVEY. I asked to except this amendment from concurrence, thinking that many Senators probably may not have observed the way in which the matter has grown. It began here with the proposition to give two lines $150,000 for the purpose of carrying on an arrangement for fast mails that had been entered into by the Post-Office Department without any legislative direction. The Senate voted at an early day of this session to reduce by 10 per cent. the allowance for carrying mails upon railroads. The House concurred in the reduction, so that we have the judgment of both Houses upon that matter that the pay should be reduced as much as 10 per cent.; but the managers of certain leading railroads in the country are dissatisfied. They make an issue with the law-making power by stopping what is known as the fast-mail trains. The metropolitan press, being greatly favored, more than any other interest, by the running of these fast lines, and favored to the detriment of the country press, at once raise a cry about the great wrong which the country suffers by the stoppage of the fast mails; and these two lines in some way secure recognition by the first amendment that is offered, and others succeed them one after another. Thus it will be seen that this thing not only opens the way for a new style of subsidizing railroads, but (although I do not believe it is intended to be so) it is in effect an invitation to railroad lobbyists to appear here and work for subsidies for each and every line of railroad that they think stands any show for getting such allowance. I see this amount has been increased already to $350,000. The New York Central and the Pennsylvania Central railroads become the pioneers in this enterprise. It should be remembered that they, and those who have followed them so far, are but pioneers; for the railroad interest of this country is gigantic, and it is being consolidated in the hands of a few managers. It aspires already to do a great deal in the way of the government of the nation and of States. The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE,] in his political speech the other day, cited us to the fact, if it be a fact, that the Pennsylvania railroad, which I have no doubt was the one meant by him——

Mr. WALLACE. I will state to the Senator that the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad is a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARVEY. Very well. At any rate it was a railroad organization, which assumed as he says effectually to bring offenders to justice in that State; in other words, that it assumed the administration of justice in that State. The Senator said something about a weak executive. I do not believe the executive of Pennsylvania is a weak man. I believe he is a thoroughly able and efficient executive; but I do say that in any state or nation where either the executive or legislature is weak, gigantic corporations will be seeking for power. They will improve every opportunity, and the passage of this bill will give a precedent and an opportunity such as never should be given in a free country. It is a concession to the power of these corporations that never ought to be made.

I have urged other reasons, but these I think are sufficient to justify me in voting against concurring in the amendment.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Upon the vote that was taken just now as to the restoration of the franking privilege I was under a misapprehension. I desire to state now that my vote should have been cast against the restoration of that privilege. It is too late to correct it in any other way than by this statement.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to call the attention of the Senator having charge of this bill to one feature of the bill, and that is, it authorizes the Postmaster-General to contract for carrying these fast mails, but there is no limitaton as to the period for which he may contract. I suggest to the Senator whether that is not leaving in the hands of the Postmaster-General more authority than he designs to leave, and whether there ought not to be some restriction as to the length of time for which he should contract. I do not suppose that the Postmaster-General will enter into any improvident contract with these companies in reference to time; but under the authority given I suppose he might contract for a long period of time. I therefore suggest to the Senator whether it would not be better to limit the period.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think there is a good deal in the suggestion, and I will move to amend by adding so as to read "to contract for a time not exceeding four years." That is the usual length of a mail contract, but if the Senator prefers I will say two years.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I prefer that the Senator should limit it to a less period than four years, for I think as it is an experiment two years will do.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is an experiment and I will say two years. That is about half the period of the usual lettings. I move to add as an additional section to the amendment the following:

SEC. —. That no contract entered into by the Postmaster-General for fast-mail service as herein provided for shall be made for a longer period than two years.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Before the vote is taken upon the passage of the bill I desire to say that I voted for the amendment for the restoration of the franking privilege because I am honestly in favor of that provision, and I did not wish to shirk any responsibility of a vote of that kind; but I am equally opposed to the provision in this bill proposing in some sense to subsidize certain railroads of this country by giving them compensation for carrying the fast-mail service. I therefore cannot vote for the bill as a whole. I must vote against the bill; but I wish it distinctly understood that in doing so I am not opposed to that feature of the bill which restores the franking privilege. For that amendment I voted, and I would have voted for it as a separate proposition; but I cannot vote for the bill which contains it, simply because the bill contains other provisions for which I cannot vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment reserved by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARVEY] in regard to the fast-mail service.

Mr. HARVEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to inquire as a matter of order if the amendment which was previously offered by me in committee can be re-offered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be offered after the amendments made in committee have been acted upon. The question is on concurring in this amendment as modified by the Senator from Maine, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Kernan, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Sargent, Wallace, Windom, and Withers—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Booth, Cockrell, Eaton, Edmunds, Harvey, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Merrimon, Ransom, Saulsbury, Spencer, and Stevenson—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, McDonald, Morton, Robertson, Sharon, Sherman, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, Whyte, and Wright—27.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I now renew the amendment offered by me in committee. I move to add as an additional section to the bill the following:

SEC. —. That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to contract for the extension of such service to Omaha, Nebraska, and the sum of $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for such purpose.

I offer this amendment because since the action of the Senate on the amendment in committee other lines of less importance, of less business, have been added to the list of fast-mail lines. I desire to state that the amount of mail which leaves Omaha going west each day amounts to 15,000 pounds. I have not at hand the statistics which show the amount that leaves Chicago, but of course between Chicago and Omaha the amount added to the amount which daily leaves Omaha westward would make the aggregate between Omaha and Chicago amount to nearly 25,000 pounds daily. If the country can afford to indulge in the expense—I will not say expensive luxury because I think it is a wise policy, and I think these fast-mail lines should be established—but if the country can afford three fast-mail lines between the East and Chicago and Saint Louis, it can afford one, I think, for the great transcontinental mail between Chicago and Omaha.

Mr. SARGENT. The effect of not carrying the mail between Chicago and Omaha is that on Thursdays in San Francisco and all California our people receive no mail at all. If a link is kept up on Sunday or Monday there is a regular mail throughout the week.

Mr. HAMLIN. We have provided for that.

Mr. SARGENT. I thought that was what the Senator from Nebraska was speaking to.

Mr. HAMLIN. That has been agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I am glad of it; it is very important. I was absent for some hours on a committee of conference, and was not aware of the action taken by the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That was agreed to. Since I was last up I have had a dispatch from the Department, which shows that I understated rather than overstated the amount. The aggregate amount between Chicago and Omaha daily is 27,779 pounds. If the country can afford to establish fast mails on these lesser lines it certainly can afford to extend the fast mail between Chicago and Omaha and reduce the time by twelve hours at least, as this appropriation would, for that amount of mail.

Mr. OGLESBY. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to ask him one question as to the cost? What will be the additional cost of extending this fast-mail line from Chicago to Omaha?

Mr. PADDOCK. Forty thousand dollars.

Mr. OGLESBY. Is that sufficient? Can it be done for $40,000?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will state for the information of the honorable Senator that I have no means at hand of stating accurately what amount will be necessary. My amendment provides the sum of $40,000. I base that more upon the relative distance between Chicago and Omaha compared with the distance between New York and Chicago, the distance between Chicago and Omaha being five hundred miles and that between New York and Chicago being one thousand miles.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask now in regard to this amendment, the amount appropriated being $40,000, do you suppose that under that you will get the benefit of the service?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I supposed so certainly, or I should not have offered the amendment. I believe so.

Mr. OGLESBY. And that no greater amount will be incurred at the end of the fiscal year than the $40,000 for this service?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is my opinion.

Mr. OGLESBY. I am inclined to vote for the Senator's amendment if it is to cost no more than that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It cannot cost any more than is appropriated.

Mr. OGLESBY. I mean to say, if it shall actually cost more that, then you will not get the service.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is very true.

Mr. OGLESBY. I do not see that the amendment will do any good, if you are not certain about the amount appropriated being sufficient. If you are certain, I shall vote for it with a great deal of satisfaction.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not by any means certain; but no money will be lost if the railroads refuse to accept the amount which is appropriated.

Mr. HAMLIN. The fast-mail service was established as an experiment. So far as we have had the benefit of it, I think we are able to state that it has been a most successful experiment; nor have I a doubt that within a reasonable period of time there will be through the main sections of the country fast routes established. The great arteries over which communication will pass will be those fast routes, and they will supply the little veins all along the lateral roads. We have now added something more to that in this bill. I hope the Senate will not agree to this amendment. There must be a limit to it somewhere. There are 27,000 pounds of mail matter daily, the Senator tells us, from Chicago to Omaha. They receive the benefit of the fast mail to Chicago at Omaha just as much as they do at Chicago; that is, they get it just twenty-four hours quicker. We have done what I think is exactly right. We have added an amendment to this bill which gives them their seven days' service in the week, as they ought to have, so as not to require the mails to lie over a day. That being done, they get their mail twenty-four hours earlier at Omaha than they would get it if this fast-mail service were abolished. You must have a limit somewhere. The time will come when it will go to Omaha, I have no doubt. I say to the Senator from Nebraska that I might myself, with double the propriety, with double the facts to fortify me, move to extend this fast route from New York to Boston, reaching all New England. Why do I not do it? Because I am willing to let this system stand as it is until we can apply it gradually and not break it down. I hope the Senate will not agree to this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. HITCHCOCK.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. OGLESBY. The post-route bill as now amended contains the amendments proposed for establishing the fast-mail-line service. I consider that a very important service, and I shall be glad to give it my support. It also provides for a restoration of the franking privilege. I am opposed to the restoration of that privilege. I know of no public necessity that demands it, and I know of no public desire for its restoration. I personally have a knowledge on the subject from those whom I in part represent. I know of no sentiment for its restoration. It is in the nature of a privilege, say of it what you may. By large numbers of the community it is regarded also as a perquisite. I am aware of the personal convenience it brings to every member. I am fully aware of the personal convenience it would bring to me; but I know its restoration brings with it burdens of great weight and consequence, for it will inevitably follow, it must as certainly follow as that effect follows cause in due and reasonable season, that the restoration of this privilege means also a return to the publication of large numbers of public documents.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to ask my friend if he does not know that in no period of the history of the Government has there been so much public printing as there has been since the franking privilege has been abolished?

Mr. OGLESBY. I was informed by the Senator from Maine some time ago that that was not so.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is a mistake.

Mr. OGLESBY. I was informed by the Senator from Maine, who I know is far more familiar with the subject than I am and I think quite as familiar with it as the Senator from Massachusetts—perhaps I am going too far in that—but I was assured by the remarks of the Senator from Maine this morning that, although the variety of the public documents is substantially adhered to, the numbers in each line have been materially diminished and that the expense of public printing stands greatly curtailed in consequence of that. I think the restoration of the franking privilege must of necessity call us back to that responsive request, which will come upon us because of this food and this encouragement, to increase the number of public documents.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him to explain what that necessity is which will demand the Congress of the United States to print documents for the mere purpose of having the fun of franking them?

Mr. OGLESBY. I will try to answer the Senator. Perhaps I shall not be able to do so satisfactorily. The people of this country do not like special privileges. I do not like them myself. I do not like what the people cannot have. I know that this franking is regarded by the public very largely as a privilege and also by some as a perquisite. The very moment that we come into the use of it, it seems natural to my mind and reasonable that they will say, "You have got the franking privilege; you have got all that Printing Establishment there; you have got all this force; now send us documents as you used to do." The Senate cannot have forgotten, I am sure I have not forgotten, that we carried that to such an extent that it became odious almost. Public documents were shipped over the country, and were unopened, unexamined, and unread to a very large extent.

Here is one point which I wish to make about public documents, and I am as frank about it as I can be. I never get a public document that I am not embarrassed. If I get three hundred and my colleague gets three hundred, or if I get one hundred and fifty and he gets the same number, or if I were to get five thousand and he the same number of any particular document, I am at once embarrassed how to dispose of them. We represent a State that has 500,000 voters in it. I am always embarrassed to know what disposition to make of a public document that I have. I cannot give it to one without selecting him from the many. I cannot tell for my life why I select him. It is not because he is wiser, not because he is better, not because he is stronger; but I somehow or other must make a selection, and it is always a disagreeable matter to me. It carries with it the taste or flavor of personal preference, which I do not like.

I voted at one time for a project of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] and I think I am still in favor of that project. I do not know that it would be a very popular project, I do not know that it would meet with universal favor; but I think the sentiment of the country would sustain it. That is, to publish all public information, the reports of all the Departments, all scientific, all accurate, correct knowledge gathered up through all the Departments of the Government from all the corners of the Republic, and publish it at the public expense at the lowest possible dime; put it down to the lowest possible cent of cost of publication and then have a list of prices affixed to every one of the documents, the public papers and records; throw every facility within the reach of the people to have this information, and to have it at cost. This morning while the franking privilege was up a constituent of mine, a citizen of the State of Illinois, stood at the door, a perfect stranger to me. I was introduced to him and asked him his sentiments about restoring the franking privilege. Said he, "I would vote against it." I asked him why? Said he, "The people where I live do not want it. If we want a public document we ought to pay for it, because all of us cannot have public documents free." It seemed to me that covered the argument in a nut-shell. Because I think this franking privilege is wrong, because I am opposed to it, because I think it distasteful to the public mind of the country, I shall, although in favor of the fast-mail service, vote against the bill for these reasons.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator from Illinois had been good enough to give us his counsel before we voted for this offensive measure, so that we could have profited by it, it would have been an act of kindness; but when he gets up and tells us after we have plunged into this slough, and tells the country what fools we are, I do not quite see what good it does me. Nevertheless, better late than never.

Mr. OGLESBY. The Senator from Wisconsin will indulge me a moment.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. OGLESBY. I wish to say that the Senator knows perfectly well that I entertain no such foolish notion at any time of being able to give him instruction or information upon any public service.

Mr. HOWE. But advice?

Mr. OGLESBY. Nor advice, nor suggestion.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator now is altogether too meek. He is able to give a great deal of advice, and he does give a great many most valuable suggestions; but in the spirit of candor that always actuates him, allow me to say that at this time there is no particular value in the suggestion that he has thrown out. He has assigned one of the best reasons in the world, one of the most conclusive reasons I ever heard here or elsewhere for his voting against this bill, and that is that he is opposed to it. That is always a good reason. But when he comes down to details and to explain why he is opposed to it, he does not make himself so clear to my mind nor is his reasoning so conclusive as it almost always is. He says first that the restoration of this franking privilege will of necessity work a return to the business of printing public documents; and I was dull enough not to see why that necessity followed so inevitably upon this vote, and asking him to explain he said that when the people saw clearly that the law clothed us with the right to send them documents free of cost, they would say "Print now, print, you can send them for nothing; keep printing, do not stop printing," and he says that that was the operation of the old law and that we, under the inspiration of these repeated and urgent demands, went on printing documents until they became odious to the people and never were opened.

Now what does my friend really think of the people? That because they see we have the right to write our names on a document they are going to insist that documents shall be printed, that the presses shall groan with that labor, and we groan with writing our franks, and send these documents to them when they are so odious that they will not open the document. The people the Senator represents are more intelligent than that, more rational; they will not make any such demand.

But the Senator says that his constituency is large; it is true; that they are a reading people; that is true. He is proud of that and does not mean to apologize for it. There is no occasion for any apology. And therefore he says that it is impossible for us to print so many documents that he and his colleague can send to everybody what everybody wants. Well, if documents have become odious to them, it will not be so difficult to supply the demand.

He says as we do print, with whatever energy we work the Printing Office, that there is a selection to be made, that he has got to determine every day whether he will send a book to Brown or Jones, to Black or White, and that is always a difficult point to determine. Very likely. He can vote against printing the document. That is one way of solving the difficulty. You can always avoid this particular irksome task by not printing the documents. If you do not print a document at all, you will not have any documents to frank; then your constituents will not have any documents to throw away; then their stomachs will not be turned by the sight of reading matter they do not want to look into. You will get rid of that in this way, and then this business of franking will be confined to the franking of letters which pass between the honorable Senator and his constituents. What about those letters? How many of them are the letters of the Senator himself? How many of them are written to others than those who are utter strangers to him who write to him on business which nobody else can transact so well as he can, and which he is obliged to reply to or refuse to reply to?

I was once an attorney at law, and I was not a Senator or anything of that sort, and I worked for fees, and my employment, always liberal, was yet limited. I did not have to work for everybody; the whole State of Wisconsin were not my clients, and I have been absolutely surprised to find how much my business increased when I found myself clothed with the senatorial office and was so conspicuously advertised to my constituents and they found I would work for nothing. Really the extent of my business is——

Mr. CONKLING. Gratifying.

Mr. HOWE. "Gratifying," my friend from New York suggests. [Laughter.] A great many times since I have had the honor of a seat here by the side of my friend from New York I have been laid under obligations to him for a suggestion. I think I never felt so gratified to him before in my life as on this occasion. Gratifying! [Laughter.] That is the sort of franking which profits the constituent and does not profit the representative, and it is the kind of franking that I think the representative should be clothed with. It seems to me it is enough if the Senator will turn aside from public business and peruse the letter which calls on him to do some errand at the Pension Office, the Patent Office, the Land Office, the Fifth Auditor's Office, the First, the Third, the Fourth, the Sixth Auditor's Office, the Treasury, the numberless Bureaus and Departments here; it is enough for him if he will read the letter, go to the office or write to the office, get the information that is wanted, hurry up the matter which concerns him, and write the reply, and give his correspondent the information; it is enough, I think, to be demanded of the representative if he will do that without requiring that he shall pay three cents or six cents or twelve cents for the privilege of making that reply and doing that work.

But that is not all. Every Senator on this floor is a member of a committee, and with that committee and the members of it the people of the United States must have open communication, and in addition to all the countless letters which every one of you has to write as an individual Senator to constituents, is a vast number of communications which you have to send by virtue of your official position on committees. I have the honor to be at the head of the Joint Committee on the Library, and during the recess the bills drawn on the funds which are to be disbursed by that committee are not very large in the aggregate of the amount drawn, but in the number of bills they are very large. They come to me. To be sure the Librarian, who draws the bills for my signature, pays the postage on the bills that he sends to me, but he does not send me stamps to pay the return postage. What is my experience in a small way is the experience of other Senators, I take it.

The Senator from Illinois says that he has heard no demand on the part of his constituents for this kind of legislation. Nor have I heard any demand for it from my constituents. It is a measure which I venture to vote for upon my personal official responsibility and in the exercise of my own judgment, such as it is, and I shall submit that act to their approval or disapproval in entire confidence that it will meet with their approval on the whole and in spite of the very forcible suggestions made by my friend from Illinois.

Mr. OGLESBY. I am impressed with the idea, after listening to the Senator from Wisconsin with the pleasure with which I always listen to him, that he was not so much distressed about the suggestions I made which involve himself and other Senators in a noose, or a corner, or some sort of trouble for having voted without having heard from me as he was that I made any remarks at all; for, after having suggested in the outset that the valuable hints I had thrown out ought to have been given earlier, I was amazed, as I suppose the Senate was, to find that they had not had any more effect on his mind than the pouring of cold water on a wild duck's back. He is "of the same opinion still" that the restoration of the franking privilege is a good thing, and he is very manly about it; he votes for it on his own suggestion and says that his constituents must canvass that vote. The Senator is able to defend himself anywhere, at home or here, and I doubt not he honestly thinks his vote is for the good of his constituents. I doubt not he thinks, as other Senators think who have voted with him, that it is a wise and proper vote to give, and that they have felt and now feel that there has been a good deal of unnecessary feeling of hostility to the franking privilege. I know Senators feel that way, and therefore they vote as they do.

I, in rising to speak when I did, did not rise for the purpose of discussing the merits of the question. I did not expect to arrest the attention of the Senate for a moment, because its merits have been gone over since I have been in this body more than one dozen times. Both sides of the question—I think that I am not mistaken about it—are fully and thoroughly understood. It was not for that purpose that I rose. I had no such visionary idea in my mind as that I could throw any new light upon it. Neither did I desire or expect to drive anybody from any conclusion he might have about it. I did not even so much as wish to make any Senator feel uncomfortable over his vote. I only intended to explain my vote against the bill as amended, having voted for the amendment proposed by the Post-Office Committee and its honorable chairman restoring the fast-mail service, and attaching a good deal of importance to the utility of that service, for I believe it is a growing service with the country. I felt willing enough to vote for its restoration and to extend it also where it had not been before; but when this other question came in to complicate the bill, although of the same nature and relating to the same subject, but as diverse in substance as two objective points can be at either extreme of the pole, I must either vote for the bill with the restoration of the fast mail and with the franking privilege in it, or I must vote against it, and as my vote in the affirmative would be understood to be an indorsement of all the bill contains, I thought I could not afford to vote for the bill with that last amendment in with regard to the restoration of the franking privilege. I merely rose to submit the reasons why I should vote on the bill as I expect to do—against it.

I do not know that my notions about the franking privilege are correct; I do not know that they are sound; but I cannot help stating before taking my seat, and then I shall leave the subject, that the same train of circumstance that followed in its establishment will again follow in its re-establishment. To reason differently is to reason that the cholera that comes occasionally from the Asiatic countries to inflict that pestilence upon us would be different in one time from what it is in another epidemic period. No, Mr. President, the same consequences will in time follow, in my opinion. I should be glad to have all that is said and done, not only the public laws passed, scattered before the people, but the proceedings preliminary to the establishment of laws; I should be perfectly willing to have the country understand every motion, every speech, the action of every committee here. I would be as glad if it were spread before the people as any Senator here, but the Republic is too large for that. Forty-five million people cannot be accommodated with free public documents. It cannot be done. You cannot scatter public documents after the old style and fashion over this country. You must resort to another, and, I think, a more intelligent and more acceptable theory. We must print them at the lowest possible cent of cost and then distribute that information, as we do all others, to our constituents at their own expense. I do not send a document to a voter in Illinois, I have not sent one since I have been in this body, that has not gone to him at the cost and expense of other citizens of Illinois who get no documents. That is a simple proposition that I can comprehend and every living man can. Is it right for me to ask for that privilege for myself without giving it also to my constituency? Shall I ask to have my messages, written letters, and correspondence to them free and not have them write back free to me? The bill itself is wise enough to cover that ground. Correspondence both ways under the amendment goes free. Right along in the train of that correspondence, all that has been done in this body will strike the public mind as being entitled to go equally free. How shall we shake off the responsibility?

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him by saying that if he will read the text of the measure he will find that he is entirely wrong? It says "sent and received."

Mr. OGLESBY. I say the amendment provides for sending and receiving free, and I say it will necessarily follow, because the reasoning goes to that, in restoring the franking privilege it was logical, it was necessary to say that if I should write free to the West, of course the people of the West should write free to me. If it is their privilege, of course they should. That I would be in favor of if I were to vote for the franking privilege, of course. That is just. Now, reasoning in the same line, I know it leaves but a very short time when the public will demand documents equally free, and this body and the other body together will have to publish them, and hundreds and thousands and millions of dollars will be piled up to publish public documents, one in a dozen, one in fifty, or possibly one in a hundred of which will be diligently studied and examined, and the rest will go flocking and flooding, like wild geese, over the country, thrown away as worthless stuff. I think we cannot return to that system again. I think it is unwise to take the preliminary step now toward a return to it, not because I would not be willing as a Senator to have the privilege of writing my correspondence free. I am not better than any other Senator in that respect. I should be very glad to have my correspondence go free; but I do not think my correspondence ought to go free when it is, as I believe, not as other gentlemen believe it is, in its consequences to entail great expense on the Public Treasury.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to ask a question.

Mr. OGLESBY. I will yield.

Mr. PADDOCK. The reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture, which are more sought for than any others by his constituents and mine, who are mainly agricultural people, are already franked under the law as it stands now. They have been franked all the time.

Mr. OGLESBY. I understand that very well.

Mr. PADDOCK. I wish to ask my friend if for the reason that we propose now to permit the franking of all other documents he thinks that more Agricultural Reports will be printed, or that because of the privilege which has heretofore existed that they might heretofore be franked, the demand for the printing has been more excessive?

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask the Senator how many Agricultural Reports did he get as a Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PADDOCK. I will say to the Senator that last year when I came here there was an accumulation of two or three years' reports, but being a new Senator I did not receive a large number. I do not recollect exactly how many; I should say at least fifty, and probably more. I am unable, however, to state exactly; but I received a respectable number, which I sent to my State.

Mr. OGLESBY. The Senator received fifty or perhaps more. I received more.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not remember the number. I wish to say that nothing I did during the time I was here last year gave so great satisfaction to the agricultural people I represent on this floor as the distribution of those reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture and the other public documents under the temporary privilege to frank the same which was given last year.

Mr. OGLESBY. I have no doubt that the distribution of the Agricultural Report by the Senator to his fifty constituents was very agreeable. I sent some two or three hundred home and I have no doubt they were very agreeably accepted. How agreeably were the other farmers feeling about that time who did not get any?

Mr. PADDOCK. I will say that where I send an Agricultural Report into an agricultural district of my State to one person a dozen or twenty and perhaps a larger number are very sure to have the use of that report. And the same is true of all public documents sent to rural constituencies.

Mr. OGLESBY. I do not know whether that is so or not; it may be so, or it may not be so. To some extent I presume it is so. I presume one farmer will hand the book to another if he cares to take it, but I do know that one thousand Agricultural Reports scattered between two hundred and fifty thousand farmers of Illinois are not so much as one drop of water in a bucket. What right have I, or has any Senator on this floor, to take fifty or one hundred Agricultural Reports and give them to such men? They may not be especial friends. He will distribute them and they get them. What right has he to select them and leave the others out? The Senator from Nebraska will say in answer, "Give me more;" ay, the whole country will say under this franking privilege, "Give us more, pour out these public documents until you flood the mails with them, do as you did ten years ago, load down the Printing Establishment, load down the cars with them." That is what I think. The Senator from Nebraska like myself must have been embarrassed because he did not receive a sufficient number. I never receive enough public documents to answer the demands of the people who would read them. Therefore those I give them to are specially privileged as I with the franking privilege am specially privileged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senate will vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Burnside, Christiancy, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Key, Logan, Maxey, Mitchell, Norwood, Paddock, Ransom, Sargent, West, and Withers—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cockrell, Conkling, Eaton, Edmunds, Harvey, Kernan, McCreery, McMillan, Morrill, Oglesby, Saulsbury, Spencer, and Stevenson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dorsey, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McDonald, Merrimon, Morton, Patterson, Randolph, Robertson, Sharon, Sherman, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, and Wright—28.

So the bill was passed.

The title of the bill was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3359) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 1021) allowing the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails in their new iron steamships.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 164) in reference to the payment of awards of the Venezuelan mixed commission; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (S. No. 1021) allowing the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails in their new iron steamships, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: After the last word insert, "Excepting compensation for service performed by the said company for the balance of the term of the contract of the said company made in pursuance of the said act of February 17, 1865, and for which appropriation has been made."

JNO. P. JONES,
H. L. DAWES,
D. M. KEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

A. M. WADDELL,
J. K. LUTTRELL,
J. A. GARFIELD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the effect of that?

Mr. DAWES. The first amendment was to correct a mistake in a date in reference to a statute. The second amendment of the House excepted the provisions of the statute under which the contract was made. It was feared at the Post-Office Department that an exception of all claims under that statute would prevent the company from obtaining compensation for carrying the mail during the remainder of the term for which an appropriation was made. The Post-Office Department suggest that to save that this additional amendment be agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not cover any fresh claims?

Mr. DAWES. Not at all. It only allows them their compensation as heretofore appropriated.

The report was concurred in.

THE SCHOOL AMENDMENT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 29, noes not counted.

LIGHT-HOUSE AND FOG-BELL IN NARRAGANSET BAY.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I wish the Senator from Vermont would allow me a few moments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the Senator has been compelled so long to be absent by sickness, I will yield for the matter he wishes to call up, if it does not lead to debate.

Mr. BURNSIDE. During my absence Senate bill No. 492, making an appropriation for a light-house and fog-bell on Narraganset Bay, was passed over on the Calendar, and I now beg the present consideration of it if there is no objection on the part of any Senator. If it leads to any discussion, I shall not press it.

This rock on which this light is proposed to be erected occupies a most dangerous position at the mouth of the west passage of Narraganset Bay. The bill is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Commerce after examination. The erection of the light has been recommended by the Light-House Board for two consecutive years. The bill calls for an appropriation of $35,000 for the erection of a light. Inasmuch as this obstacle is in the main line of communication between the whole of the lower coast and the upper coast and New England and also the southern coast with Providence and Narraganset Bay, I hope Senators will deem it wise to allow the bill to pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 492) making an appropriation for the erection of a monument and spindle on Whale Rock, at the entrance of Narraganset Bay.

The Committee on Commerce propose to amend the bill so to make it read:

That there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $35,000 for the purpose of erecting a light-house and fog-bell on Whale Rock at the entrance of Narraganset Bay, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house and fog-bell on Whale Rock, at the entrance of Narraganset Bay."

RECESS.

Mr. INGALLS. At the suggestion of other Senators, I will state that it is desirable that the session should continue to-night. For the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate, if there is no objection, I will move a recess from five o'clock to half past seven.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

HANNAH W. SUMNER.

Mr. CONKLING. As there are now but ten minutes left of the hour at which the recess begins, if the Senator from Vermont has no objection I will ask the Senate to take up a long-belated House bill now on the Calendar, touching the pension of Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner. I will not state, because the committee know, that there are some reasons of merit about this case which lead me to move its consideration, and as nothing can be done with the regular order in this interval, I ask that it be taken up now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to a call for the regular order. I make no objection to anything being taken up if that is the general understanding. I say so now to save time in repeating it, as there are only ten minutes left.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 2271) to increase the pension of Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for pensioning Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of the late Major-General Edwin V. Sumner, who died March 21, 1863, while in command of the Department of the West, at the rate of $50 per month during her widowhood, in lieu of the pension heretofore granted to her under the provisions of the general pension laws.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EASTERN BAND OF CHEROKEES.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 3209, which will take but a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order long enough to request the Chair to ask unanimous consent that the regular order shall not be displaced by any of these matters before the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair understands.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 3209) to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to receive lands in payment of judgments to eastern band of Cherokee Indians was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It empowers the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to collect and receive, in payment of the amount due on certain judgments in favor of William Johnston and against William H. Thomas, now held by him in trust for the eastern band of Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, the lands mentioned and described in the award of Rufus Barringer, John H. Dillard, and Thomas Ruffin, as a board of arbitrators, under date of October 23, 1874, upon which such judgments were a lien; the lands to be taken at their cash value, to be determined by an appraisal to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior and conveyed to the eastern band of Cherokee Indians in fee simple.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BERTHOLD LOEWENTHAL.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask leave to call up House bill No. 1713, reported from the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 1713) for the relief of Berthold Loewenthal, of Chicago, Illinois, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Berthold Loewenthal of $14,850, or so much thereof as he shall prove, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that he has expended in the purchase of revenues-tamps used by him to stamp manufactured tobacco and snuff, upon which a tax had previously been paid, under the revenue law in force at the time of their manufacture and sale, but which were made liable to be stamped under the act of July 20, 1868, thus requiring a double tax on the same tobacco and snuff.

Mr. LOGAN. There is a very lengthy report from the House committee and a report of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] from the Finance Committee of the Senate, and the bill itself was referred to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and is perfectly correct.

Mr. COOPER. The bill is entirely right.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HAWAIIAN TREATY.

Mr. SARGENT. I only rise to give notice to the Senate that after the constitutional amendment has been disposed of I shall ask the Senate to take up the Hawaiian treaty bill.

HELEN M. STANSBURY.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Helen M. Stansbury, reported from the Committee on Pensions. It is a very worthy case.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 832) to increase the pension of Helen M. Stansbury was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to pay to Helen M. Stansbury, widow of Major Howard Stansbury, late major in the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, a pension at the rate of $25 per month, to be in lieu of the pension now paid to her.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. GORDON. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 951) to remove the political disabilities of Stephen D. Lee, of the State of Mississippi.

There being no objection, the bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GORDON. I move to amend by adding the names of John G. Walker, of Texas, and C. M. Wilcox, of Maryland. They are all reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think the Wilcox bill is already passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS. I suggest that all the cases of this kind on the Calendar be added.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed by a two-thirds vote.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to remove the political disabilities of Stephen D. Lee and others."

HARVEY & LEVESY.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3849.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3849) for the relief of James W. Harvey and James Levesy, of the firm of Harvey & Levesy, of Wisconsin, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill refers the claim of James W. Harvey and James Levesy for alleged labor done and materials furnished under their contract with the United States for the building of the masonry work for the piers and abutments of the bridge across the Mississippi River from Rock Island to Davenport, Iowa, bearing date June 1, 1869, to the Court of Claims for hearing and adjudication, and to that end confers jurisdiction on the court to proceed in the adjustment of the accounts between the claimants and the United States as a court of equity jurisdiction, and provides that it may, according to the rules and principles of equity jurisprudence, in its judicial discretion, reform the contract and render such judgment as justice and right between the claimants and the Government may require.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS. Has the bill been reported favorably?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It is a House bill, considered by the Senate Committee on Claims, and reported favorably.

The bill was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of five o'clock having arrived the Senate takes a recess until half past seven.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate re-assembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

THOMAS I. FOX.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask unanimous consent to take up a bill on the Calendar for the pensioning of a blind soldier. It is regularly reported by the Committee on Pensions, House bill No. 1089.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 1089) granting a pension to Thomas I. Fox, late a private of Company C, Fifty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) providing for a commission to examine into the method of collecting internal-revenue taxes on distilled spirits and fermented liquors; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 852) for the relief of Elisha E. Rice;

A bill (S. No. 944) for the relief of Gilderoy M. Hardy;

A bill (S. No. 990) to remove the political disabilities of Reuben Davis, of Mississippi; and

A bill (S. No. 1036) to provide for the printing and distribution of the reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the years 1874 and 1875.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 846) to punish the counterfeiting of trade-mark goods and the sale or dealing in of counterfeit trade-mark goods.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3962) to provide means to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia until December 1, 1876, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GEORGE WILLARD of Michigan, Mr. G. W. CATE of Wisconsin, and Mr. J. HARTRIDGE of Georgia managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the adjournment of both Houses of Congress on Monday, the 14th instant, at four o'clock p. m.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 561) for the relief of Major Junius T. Turner; and

A bill (S. No. 1007) concerning the employment of Indian scouts.

HARRY E. EASTMAN.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3374.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be subject to a call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All these requests will be so considered.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3374) for the relief of Harry E. Eastman, late lieutenant-colonel Second Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Harry E. Eastman, of Green Bay, Wisconsin, of $639.08, in full satisfaction of his claim for pay as lieutenant-colonel of the Second Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAVING OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely want to call up a District bill that will take but a moment. I ask that the bill amending the act passed for repaving Pennsylvania avenue be taken up. It is the bill (H. R. No. 4085) to repeal part of section 5 of an act entitled "An act authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue," approved July 19, 1876.

Mr. SARGENT. I object, not capriciously, but I think for good reasons.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is House joint resolution No. 1, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL. I want to appeal to the Senator from California. It is deemed necessary by the commissioners appointed to take charge of the work that this bill should pass.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to ask the Senator is it not true that the property-holders on the Avenue have petitioned against this bill, stating that they have suffered on account of the condition of the Avenue.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not so understand. I understand that some of them have, but I do not understand that even those persons who have so petitioned, on a proper understanding of the facts, would object. The amount of it is that there are two provisions in the act that passed, one granting time that might be necessary and another providing that it shall be done by the 1st of December. Now it is questionable what this proviso applies to; and if by any accident the work should go over beyond the 1st of December it is then doubtful whether they can proceed to levy the tax upon the adjacent property-holders. But I wish to say to the Senator from Califonia and also to any that may feel an interest in the matter, that there is no purpose whatever to procrastinate this paving. It will be done most likely by the 1st of November.

Mr. SARGENT. I have so much confidence in the judgment of my friend from Vermont on matters relative to this District, in which he takes so much interest, that I am going to withdraw the objection, although I do it with some misgivings, I must confess. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I think there is no sort of doubt about it.

Mr. CONKLING. To be frank with the Senator from Vermont, I want to say that I shall object to an unconditional repeal of that provision. If the purpose of the Senator is to extend the time to the 1st of January, I will not object to that, and so I have said to some of these proposed contractors who have spoken to me about it; but I will not by my vote allow these men to tear up the pavement of Pennsylvania avenue and then take their own time, whether it be through the whole of next winter or the summer after or some other time, to complete this job. Anything for which I vote must have a day fixed. There are 90,000 yards of this pavement. They say a thousand yards a day is a good day's work. That would require ninety days in the clear. Deducting Sundays and rainy days perhaps it is fair to say that there would be twenty-eight or thirty days lost between now and the 1st of December. That would leave them scant of ninety days. I will vote to extend the time so as to give them ninety days or one hundred days in the clear to do this thing. I take it for granted the contract will provide for such scrutiny and verification of this work that men will not be able to put off a slighted job upon the Government. But I repeat that I will not consent, either by withholding objection or any other way, to have this contract so made that the contractors at their convenience, either by the 1st of January or the 1st of March or on the 1st of next August as they please, may complete this roadway. The pavement of the street originally was an outrage. I have the right to say that because I looked upon it and I know how the blocks were put down. I watched it while it was being done. I am not willing to run the risk of a second botch and swindle in this pavement or an imposition by having them take a century if they choose with the privilege of repeating, to lay the pavement on this street.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order. This evidently will lead to debate.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask the Senator from Vermont to yield to me that I may read some dispatches?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think they will lead to debate.

Mr. SPENCER. I have received dispatches from Alabama which are a full and complete answer to dispatches received the other day by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] to which I beg the attention of the Senate. I ask to have them read. They are very brief.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am afraid they will lead to debate.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator can read them in debating the amendment. He has a right to debate the amendment.

Mr. SPENCER. Certainly I have.

TRADE-MARK GOODS.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, being compelled to be absent from the Senate in the morning, I ask unanimous consent to take up a message from the House which lies on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to a call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 846) to punish the counterfeiting of trade-mark goods and the sale or dealing in counterfeit trade-mark goods.

Mr. CONKLING. It is so late in the session that I think it hardly worth while to ask another conference with the House, although it differs radically with the Senate and the Judiciary Committee of the Senate touching this bill; but as the House has left it somewhat better than no bill at all, after consulting with the members of the Judiciary Committee I move that the Senate recede from its vote disagreeing to the House amendments and let the House have its way upon the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SCHOOL AMENDMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause of the joint resolution and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XVI.

No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; and no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under any State. No public property and no public revenue of, nor any loan of credit by or under the authority of, the United States, or any State, Territory, District, or municipal corporation, shall be appropriated to or made or used for the support of any school, educational or other institution under the control of any religious or anti-religious sect, organization, or denomination, or wherein the particular creed or tenets of any religious or anti-religious sect, organization, or denomination shall be taught. And no such particular creed or tenets shall be read or taught in any school or institution supported in whole or in part by such revenue or loan of credit; and no such appropriation or loan of credit shall be made to any religious or anti-religious sect, organization, or denomination, or to promote its interests or tenets. This article shall not be construed to prohibit the reading of the Bible in any school or institution; and it shall not have the effect to impair rights of property already vested.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power, by appropriate legislation, to provide for the prevention and punishment of violations of this article.

Mr. SPENCER. I have received this afternoon these two dispatches from Alabama. They are in answer to the dispatch read by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] the other day from the chairman of the democratic State central committee, who stated that there have been no intimidation, no violence, in the election which took place there on last Monday.

These dispatches are:

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, August 11, 1876.

Hon. GEO. E. SPENCER:

The election was conducted under new laws, under color of which thousands upon thousands of republican voters were denied the right of suffrage. In no proper sense was there an election by the people in Alabama on last Monday.

CHARLES E. MAYER,
Chairman Republican State Executive Committee.

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, August 11, 1876.

United States Senator GEORGE E. SPENCER:

We emphatically deny any allegation to the effect that the election last Monday was conducted throughout Alabama with fairness or without disturbance or complaint of intimidation. Our denial will be sustained upon any fair investigation. As the issue has been publicly made such investigation seems due to all parties.

W. H. SMITH,
Chairman of Republican State Executive Committee.

Mr. President, all I desire to say is that I hope the Senate will appoint a special committee to investigate this election. As investigations seem to be a favorite subject with the democrats of this Congress, I can see no better opportunity than to investigate this election. I hope it will be done.

Mr. STEVENSON. This is a very important amendment to the Constitution, and I do not think there is a quorum present. I therefore ask to have the roll called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The roll cannot be called on mere demand. The Senator can make some motion that will make a test. Of course we do not want to vote without a quorum.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and 31 Senators answered to their names, as follows:

Messrs. Bogy, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Cockrell, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Paddock, Randolph, Sargent, Spencer, Stevenson, Wadleigh, West, and Windom.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the absentees be called.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators; and on this call

Mr. LOGAN answered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Four are lacking to make a quorum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absentees.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. NORWOOD, Mr. BOOTH, and Mr. OGLESBY presently entered the Senate Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (at seven o'clock and fifty-five minutes.) There is a quorum present.

Mr. HOWE. I move that further proceedings under the call be suspended.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want the floor. I want the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary as a substitute for the House resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, so long a time had passed by since the introduction of the Blaine amendment to the Constitution, relating to the public-school system, and so little interest had been taken in it of late, that I concluded it had served the purpose of its author, and was not likely to further engage public attention at this session.

In this view I was mistaken. We found upon our desks a day or two since the substance of the Blaine amendment, with a clause from the House committee added thereto, and we were informed that so far as the action of the House of Representatives was concerned the constitutional amendment was adopted.

Immediately following this action came a series of propositions changing that adopted by the House. Although the Blaine amendment had been before the country for months, had received no alteration or suggestion from its warmest friends, had been the text of praise and approval from one end of the country to the other for more than half of the year, no one questioned its force or validity, or doubted its efficacy if made a part of the Federal Constitution, until it received a sanction that has clearly disturbed and surprised some of the members of this body who are not democrats.

So we find upon looking at the report of the Judiciary Committee on our desks just now that the author of the Blaine amendment, in the judgment of the majority of the Judiciary Committee—to put it courteously—was either wanting in brains or honesty. For the propositions of the Judiciary Committee in substance declares that the amendment he proposes, and that which every republican paper in the land has for months sustained as indispensable to good government, is no amendment at all, would be non-effective if passed, and utterly falls short of the object of its promoters.

It does seem to me, Mr. President, and it will seem to the real friends of education, and to the plain people of the country, that all the wisdom and light that is now suddenly launched upon this amendment should have been given long ere this by the sincere friends of public schools. The amendment as it comes to us from the House is deemed by men as wise and learned as we are a complete and efficient act. It has, in substance, received the sanction of the great majority of the press and the people. Thus its adoption by the States would give rise to little or no contention, and when adopted would be received by courts and people as a final disposition of a dangerous question.

The amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee is an altogether different affair from that the people have asked for or the press discussed. It opens, if adopted, many grave questions, good enough for the welfare of the legal profession, but bad enough for the body-politic. It will leave in doubt much that is now deemed settled, and, as it seems to me from the hasty perusal I have been able to give to the paper to-day, instead of disposing of a vexed question, taking it out of politics and contention, its main result, if it is not its object, will be to arouse anew, and unnecessarily, an element of discord.

I can take no part in any such legislation, save to attempt to prevent it. I have labored hard all the session to have an amendment passed substantially like that sent to us from the House. It is reasonable in character, acceptable to most men of all creeds and denominations, has no latent purpose to excite, no new scheme to add to the already dangerous powers of Congress, and, as is believed by most men, would prove a just and peaceful settlement.

For the House amendment I shall steadily vote; for all alterations of that proposition I shall vote against, as I believe most of the true friends of education should. The adoption of the House amendment concludes congressional action and relegates final action to the States. And if two-thirds of the Legislatures of the States concur in the House article, in my judgment it will be perfectly competent for the Secretary of State, in the usual form, to declare the fact and promulgate the additional article of the Constitution. Article 5 of the Constitution says:

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as parts of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

Now, if it be contended that the House amendment does not set forth precisely which way the States shall make their ratification—whether by conventions or by the action of State Legislatures—my reply is that the defect may easily and promptly be remedied by an act or joint resolution of Congress designating the mode of ratification required, and such legislation would not take one hour, as we all full well know. There is no real difficulty, Mr. President, in the way of making the House amendment to the Constitution effective if all agree or a portion of the republican side agree that all good citizens should strive to make "religious dissensions as a force in politics as absurd as witchcraft."

If the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives shall become a part of the organic law, and its adoption shall make religious dissension as a force in politics profitless, then, sir, I shall consider it to have been one of the special privileges of my public life to have assisted by my vote to so important a result.

In my decision upon the House constitutional amendment I am guided by two considerations: first, is it right to enact; second, is it expedient to do? As no sensible and patriotic man questions the righteousness of an act that tends to bring peace out of discord, and as the elimination of the religious question from politics can have but one tendency, I have no doubt as to the righteousness of the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives.

This leaves alone to be determined the question of expediency; and this I decide upon the principle that whatever change can be wrought within the organic law, right in itself and tending to "insure tranquillity" and "promote the public welfare," is wise to do.

The House proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, which I desire adopted, is in these words:

ART. 16. No State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, and no money raised by taxation in any State for the support of public schools, or derived from any public fund therefor, nor any public lands devoted thereto, shall ever be under the control of any religious sect or denomination; nor shall any funds so raised, or lands so used, be divided among any religious sects or denominations.

This article shall not vest, enlarge, or diminish legislative power in Congress.

It is simply an additional inhibition upon the States; no more, no less. It aims to be a conserving power in controlling that which, in most States, exists. It founds no new principle, expresses no opinion as to the wisdom or policy of an existing practice. It recognizes the fact that a system known as the common-school system has obtained in almost every State, has the sanction directly or indirectly of most State governments, has the generous support of most taxpayers, has passed almost unchallenged by the sentinels of the press, and has had for years the great sanction of an overwhelming public opinion.

It is with this existing policy as to a system of general education that the House amendment proposes to deal; by inhibiting States from establishing any form of religion; by forbidding them from permitting the public funds raised for the support of public schools to be under sectarian control or divided between religious denominations. From beginning to end as to the States there is no directory word in the amendment proposed by the House, only provisional ones. When any State shall have raised money by taxation for the support of public schools or obtained public moneys by other means, no portion of it shall be under sectarian control or divided between religious denominations.

Should one or more of the States decline, or omit to raise money for school purposes, or, possessing public moneys, decline to use them for such purposes, to them the new amendment is of non-effect. Its operation is not necessarily universal. In this respect it is less inhibiting than most of the inhibitory clauses of the Constitution. The effect of the House amendment is not to affirm education by Government as a principle, but to establish a principle regulating the policy of such States as may locally favor the public-school system.

Education, as the word is commonly used, is not a duty of the Federal Government, as ours is constituted. Nor, sir, can it ever be, without we make a certain and dangerous surrender to gain a possible advantage. As it now stands there is not a word to be found in the Federal Constitution—direct—or capable of fair construction—implied, that makes it a duty of Government to attend to the education of the children of its citizens. It is one of its privileges to assist, as it has done, whenever in its discretion the Congress has deemed such assistance wise or beneficent. Thus, the grant of public lands for township schools in the new States and for agricultural colleges in all the States, the advantages of which we have yet to fully appreciate.

But, sir, I re-affirm that there is not only no duty devolving upon the Federal Government, by reason of any provision in the Constitution, to directly care for the education of its citizens, but that the attempt upon the part of the Federal power to exercise authority in this direction would be without warrant, and as pernicious in precedent as it would finally become dangerous in practice.

But we are told we should make education a Government duty. We are warned to heed the "public conscience" upon this matter. The conscience of the State! Sir, there is no such reality. There cannot be. Conscience is the development of a moral element within the individual. State conscience there is none. Public sentiment there is, no doubt; but to confound the two is fatal to right and truth.

But public sentiment—interest, or prejudice perhaps, not reason always nor often—is the varying weather-vane. Conscience is the moral element in man, the ever-growing monument of reason and right and religion.

Can the state, with an ever-changing policy upon most public questions, be rightfully said to have a "conscience?"

Will you make the will of the majority the conscience of the state? It can have but one; what shall it be? As to the duty of education, for instance, shall it favor Catholic or Protestant? Whichever one, its enforcement tends to tread down and out the other creed. If there be in truth a public conscience it should be obeyed, and obedience compels a standard. And a decision as to what the true one is, compels a council. It would soon need a supreme arbitrator—thus a Pope!

This is the logical sequence to the assertion of a public conscience; this, sooner or later, a result as fatal to freedom of conscience as could be contrived.

There is a general belief that good government requires by some sufficient means religious as well as secular education. Protestants and leading American Catholics agree in this.

Infidels and some other sects deny the necessity. The present issue as to where secular education ends and religious teaching begins is mainly between Protestants and Catholics. Agreeing in the main proposition, they are at irreconcilable difference as to the means. Most Protestants urge taxation for the support of public schools, in which they would have limited religious instruction. Catholics would have no general taxation for the purpose; or if any be had, then an equitable distribution of the moneys raised. The Catholic preference is for an education dependent upon the will of the parent, or the zeal of rival religious organizations. They contend that in the advanced position of the cause of education in the United States the wide-spread knowledge of the premium which society gives to intelligence will ever insure fair education to the masses. Protestants assert that history does not sustain this view.

Many even claim that the security of the state hinges upon the education of its people; that ignorance is the instrument of despotism, as intelligence is its foe. Thus it is argued the free state can only maintain its integrity through the education of its citizens. If this be strictly true then education must be compulsory. Then if you may compel my child to learn the lessons the state deems best, and those lessons be what a majority of the state, through temporary rulers, agree upon, what becomes of the priceless guarantee of liberty of conscience?

What is education? Shall the state cease its care with instructing the mind? What of the morals of its coming citizen? Surely the state has an equal interest, at least, in moral as in intellectual education. Then what of the physical condition of its people? All history teaches that a race physically degenerate rapidly deteriorates in mind and morals. Physiologists claim that the only sound basis for a race that would steadily rise in the scale of intelligence and morals is (primarily) in healthful physical life.

Shall the state, finally agreeing to this doctrine, enact laws regulating and controlling the physical habits of the citizen?

I do not imagine, Mr. President, that any of the extreme illustrations I have used are likely to occur. The attempt would revolutionize and wreck the state. What I have endeavored to show by extreme illustrations is that, if Government once embarks upon the supreme care of the citizen as to education in one direction, logically it may in all. The want of wisdom in such an attempt needs no argument.

A word in passing upon another phase. There has grown to be a zeal without judgment in the matter of public education that demands our attention as legislators and citizens.

In an undue haste to give education to our children we may sometimes overlook that species that "teaches by example."

What, for instance, shall the Virginian of the future say when he is told that his State bestowed nearly $3,000,000 in support of its public schools in 1875 and in the same year for want of means defaulted in the payment of part of its public debt? Yet I am told this is a fact, the result of a constitution forced upon the people of a State by political adventurers and zealots, without intelligence to guide or honest purpose to control them.

What comfort to the widow and orphan, bondholders of Virginia, that though their claims are unpaid, their neighbors' children are educated?

Mr. President, we must cease to consider the state as any other thing than what human wisdom or human infirmity has made it. There is no "conscience" in it, no nearer approximate to that

> Inward monitor in man,
> Owing allegiance to no earthly power, than sentiment, healthful or sickly.

Education is the privilege as it is the duty of the citizen. It is not the function of a republican state.

As citizens agreeing in the main as to the wisdom and beneficence of having our children intellectually taught, we may and do through our local legislators largely agree to taxation for school purposes, but not for denominational ones. To this extent, and to this only, can we go without infringement upon the rights or consciences of others; no matter how few they be in number or weak in power, their rights should be as sacred and inviolate as law can indicate and justice enforce.

No person who knows my record will accuse me of unfriendly feeling to the cause of education or to a system of public schools.

I would give the fullest chance to every child in the land. I have a hearty sympathy with all who would gain knowledge and thus attempt at least to rise to positions of prominence and usefulness.

But I cannot be counted as an advocate of a system, great and beneficent as it is and loving its fruits as I do, if it is grounded in error and lives by injustice. My conscience teaches me that all such structures are builded on the shifting sands and will finally perish.

The public schools have wrought great results, and principally that one which now makes the system a fixed policy of every community in the land. So certainly have our people been indoctrinated with the necessity of public schools that if every State system were abandoned to-morrow, there would promptly arise a local one adapted to the wants of the community, supported by common consent or by simple local taxation, and supervised by a vigilance that is now relegated by the citizens to others.

So much has been gained by the present system; a thirst for knowledge, an evidence to all of its wonderful power, and a decision to be accepted as final, that the American people will be second to none in striving for all the advantages which education brings.

Thus far I have endeavored to show as to the amendment proposed by the House of Representatives—

That it is but an added inhibition upon the States.

That it simply seeks to deal with a wide-spread practice as to education.

That upon many of the States it is of no additional effect, because they have already, in spirit, adopted amendments to their own constitutions of similar effect.

That it is less inhibitory than any original inhibition upon the States by the Federal Constitution.

That the purpose of the amendment is not to affirm a principle as to the duty of Government to educate, but to regulate in one respect the practice of States as to education.

Did my limited time permit I would endeavor to demonstrate that from the nature of men's education under differing theories of duty to God and his fellows compromise and reconciliation upon any system of general religious education is impracticable.

I have indicated what seems to me to be, if persisted in, the ultimate of any system that antagonizes large bodies of citizens, attracting to them through sympathy—that oppression, real or fancied, ever begets—a large and constantly increasing number of non-religious citizens. As a Protestant, believing in the beneficence and desiring the advancement by fair means of my own religious doctrines, I protest against a public policy that brings so little of gain to me, and that promises so much to my differing fellow-citizens.

Mr. President, I am aware that all these views are not in harmony with those of many of those with whom my religious sympathies are. I sincerely regret that I am compelled to differ with them, but my convictions of duty leave me no alternative. I am persuaded, after long and careful examination, that our true policy is to have and defend strictly non-sectarian schools, and that the effort to have others supported at the common cost is not only an injustice to a portion of the tax-payers of the country, but is a great and growing source of danger to the cause of popular education.

It is over a year since I saw in the leading Presbyterian journal of New York a hearty indorsement of these words from Archbishop Bayley, of the Church of Rome:

> If we wish our people to be comforted with religion, we must take care of them ourselves, and the sooner we gird ourselves up to the work the better for them and our own souls.

Is it not wiser and safer that we who would place public education upon an enduring basis should so decide as to leave political affairs as the business alone of the state and religious teachings the duty of parents and of denominations and sects?

A word in closing. The effect of the amendment suggested by the Senate committee as a substitute for the House article is to prohibit all religious instruction in any "institution" supported in whole or in part by the public moneys. Thus it would come to pass that in all prisons and reformatory institutions no religious teaching can be had, because under the article proposed "no particular creed or tenet" can be lawfully taught. Those who from vice and immorality most need religious teaching, and who are wholly inaccessible to parents or friends, are absolutely cut off, should the Senate committee's amendment be adopted?

Yet the same article of the Constitution proposed by them says that the reading of the Bible shall not be prohibited in any school or institution. Is not this a flat contradiction; or is the Bible a non-religious book?

The "article" proposed by the Senate seems to me most contradictory in this regard.

I could scarcely furnish a stronger illustration of the difficulties that surround those who insist upon non-religious teaching in one breath and in the next make constitutional provision for reading the Bible in all public institutions. Which edition shall it be, if the state assumes to designate one according to its "conscience?" Is it not wiser and better and far more just that each individual, even the criminal, shall decide what his religious needs are?

The whole difficulty after all narrows down to this, that it is impracticable to teach religion in schools supported at the public expense and not violate the divine law, which sums up our human duties and obligations in the injunction—

Do unto others as ye would be done by.

Mr. President, I am sincerely desirous that a speedy, permanent, and just settlement of this disturbing and dangerous question be had The amendment passed by the House of Representatives is the one upon which the judgment of the American people has substantially passed. Its adoption by the Senate will be quickly followed by the ratification of the necessary States.

It lies within the power of the republican majority of this body to forever take the religious element out of politics. Will they do it?

The hours of the session remaining to us are few. The attempt to remodel so important a matter as an amendment to the Constitution, almost unanimously adopted by the House, and sustained by the prominent men and leaders of both parties in that body, will be understood by the American people to be an evasion of the question. They are not to be blinded by sophistries. They understand that by the almost unanimous voice of the Representatives of the people a final and satisfactory solution has been proffered. It remains to be seen whether the party in power in this body will refuse to adopt the offer, and by subterfuges seek to keep open the question for political capital, regardless of the public welfare and the great interest presented in the cause of free education.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. EATON. As I understand, this is the vote on the amendment of the Senate committee that we are now to take.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. EATON. This is not a vote in favor, but a vote on the substitution, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A vote on the amendment in the form of a substitute.

Mr. EATON. A vote in favor of the substitution, if I understand it, does not pass the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not pass the joint resolution; it is an amendment to it on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McDONALD, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. MORTON;] and as he expressed his disapprobation of the House resolution and as I am in favor of the House resolution rather than the amendment which has been proposed, I shall decline to vote.

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CLAYTON. On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.] If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS. I have been requested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to announce that he is paired with his colleague, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. DENNIS, (after having first voted in the negative.) I voted on the impression that this was not a political question. Since it seems to be so regarded, I desire to state that I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] on such questions. If he were here I presume he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay." I ask to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the withdrawal of the vote of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to say that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. ROBERTSON] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] on all political questions, and desired me to make the announcement.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to state that I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] on all political questions. I do not know whether he would consider this a political question or not.

Mr. ALLISON. I think he would.

Mr. SAULSBURY. A constitutional amendment ought not to be a political question; but I do not want to vote if the friends of the Senator consider it political.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair reminds the Senator that debate is not in order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am told several gentlemen have refrained from voting under similar circumstances. I only desire to say that I should vote against the substitute, if I voted at all.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 15; as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Spencer, Wadleigh, and West—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Gordon, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, and Stevenson—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hamlin, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McDonald, Merrimon, Morton, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—29.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the third reading I ask for the yeas and nays because some of our friends on the other side may have voted against the amendment thinking it was unnecessary to the original proposition, and now that it is adopted I dare say we shall get a unanimous vote.

Mr. SARGENT. Will it not do to have the yeas and nays on the passage?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I would rather have them on the third reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the amendment to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read the third time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GORDON. I wish to make an inquiry whether after the vote is taken on the passage of the resolution now before us there will still be an opportunity to vote upon the resolution as it came from the House. I desire to vote for the resolution as it came from the House if it be possible to get at it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been stricken out.

Mr. EATON. I should like to ask the Chair what the result of this vote is. There is so much confusion on the floor that I do not know what the question is that is about being put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is now in the Senate. The amendment agreed to on the yeas and nays in committee has been concurred in in the Senate by a viva voce vote. The question now is on ordering the amendment to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read the third time.

Mr. EATON. It is not on its passage yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not yet. That will be the next stage.

Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand the Chair to rule that it would be out of order to offer the House resolution to the present resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not so rule. The Chair answered the question of the Senator from Georgia that the House resolution was stricken out.

Mr. GORDON. I asked the Chair—I do not know whether the Chair understood me or not—whether it was competent to offer the House resolution as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not be after this vote.

Mr. GORDON. It is now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is open to amendment before the third reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have voted to strike out that very thing and therefore it is not in order to restore it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But it is proposed to strike out and insert.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have voted to strike out that thing and insert the other, which has been done. Now the Senator wants to strike out what we have just put in, and put in what we have struck out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Georgia to wish to strike out and insert other matter.

Mr. GORDON. No; I mean simply to offer the House resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That cannot be done. That has been stricken out.

Mr. RANSOM. My friend from Georgia will allow me to say that the question decided by the vote just taken was that the Senate preferred the amendment of the Judiciary Committee to the resolution as it came from the House.

Mr. ALLISON. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays will be taken on ordering the amendment to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read the third time.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DENNIS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.] If present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. McDONALD, (when his name was called.) I have the same statement to make that I made a few moments since in reference to the pair with my colleague, [Mr. MORTON.]

The call of the roll was concluded.

Mr. CLAYTON. I again state that I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.] If present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. WINDOM. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] on all political questions. Not knowing whether he would consider this a political question or not, I decline to vote. If at liberty I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Spencer, Wadleigh, and West—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Gordon, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, and Stevenson—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hamlin, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McDonald, Merrimon, Morton, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—29.

So the amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it in order now to fix a time for the third reading? If it is in order, I move that the joint resolution be read the third time to-morrow at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the third reading be to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I thought we had just voted on the third reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have ordered it to be read the third time, and this is to fix the time when it shall be read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is in order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Several SENATORS. Let us have a division.

Mr. BOGY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to make a personal statement, if the Senate will allow me one moment. I have no objection, of course, to voting on this resolution to-morrow at one o'clock. I do not want, however, to give a vote which looks as if I was fixing a time when I should avoid the vote myself and it is absolutely impossible for me to be in the Senate to-morrow so early as that. If I do not vote to fix that time, it is only because I do not wish even to seem to fix an hour when I am certain not to be here myself to vote upon a matter which I am entirely willing and desirous to record myself upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to make one remark in explanation of what the Senator from New York has referred to. I have made this motion, as I am frank to say, for the reason that the Senate is thin to-night, and I fear from the votes that the resolution may be lost on its passage, it requiring two-thirds. My object is to fix a time when if possible the Senate may be full and we can have a fair and full vote upon it. I am sorry that my friend from New York is obliged to be absent; but in order to defend this good amendment, as I believe it to be, to the best of my power, I make this motion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say that I am opposed to fixing the hour, because that will necessarily cut off any debate, as I apprehend, and this is an important question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me suggest to my friend that it does not cut off any debate. After the resolution is read the third time, the question of its passage is open.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If that is the case, I have no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe it takes two-thirds to make a special order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is not a special order.

Mr. EATON. Under one view of the Constitution it would cut off debate; under another it would not; and my inquiry of the Chair is whether the vote was to be taken at one o'clock or whether action is to proceed at one o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be open to debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When it has been read the third time.

Mr. EATON. I only desired to know what the motion was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is that the third reading be at the time named. After the third reading it will be open to debate on the passage.

Mr. EATON. I hope the call for the yeas and nays will be withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Chair whether making a special order does not require two-thirds?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This, however, will not require two-thirds; it is not a special order.

Mr. EATON. May I ask the Chair if a majority vote carries it over until to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. EATON. I supposed so, and therefore I requested my friend who called for the yeas and nays to withdraw the call.

Mr. GORDON. I think that is a mistake, begging the pardon of the Chair and my friend from Connecticut. It seems to me the rule requires a two-thirds vote to make a special order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are not making a special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is only to fix the hour when the resolution shall be read the third time, not to take up a proposition.

Mr. GORDON. Then I think that would require unanimous consent. However, I shall submit to the Chair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is the constant course of parliamentary law to fix the day for reading a bill, either one hour hence, or two hours hence when it is engrossed, or to-morrow, or any other time. It is the simplest motion ever heard of.

Mr. DAVIS, It occurs to me, without appealing from the decision of the Chair, that to name a time is fixing a time, and that would be to make this the special order to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps we shall get two-thirds even on that view.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to hear the rule read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

44. When an amendment to be proposed to the Constitution is under consideration the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present shall not be requisite to decide any question for amendments, or extending to the merits, being short of the final question.

Mr. DAVIS. Now the rule on page 140 of the Manual requires two-thirds to make a special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read that rule.

Mr. DAVIS. That is the rule I had reference to.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

31. * * * No bill, joint resolution, or other subject shall be made a special order for a particular day and hour without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You might as well hold that we cannot order a recess for to-morrow or anything else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair rules that this vote does not require two-thirds. The rule is specific in regard to amendments to the Constitution that all intermediate votes shall require but a majority.

Mr. DAVIS. The ruling is only as relates to constitutional amendments?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. DAVIS. I will if the Senator desires me to do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, I wish him to very much.

Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand the ruling of the Chair to be only as regards amendments to the Constitution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair bases his decision upon that rule.

Mr. DAVIS. If it were not an amendment to the Constitution, then, the Chair would rule differently, am I to understand?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a supposititious case. The Chair does not rule on that.

Mr. DAVIS. I have a right to ask the Chair whether under the present rules ordinarily fixing the hour for business the Chair would so rule. The Chair can make answer as he thinks proper. If that is the ruling of the Chair, I have no disposition to appeal and I withdraw the appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw the call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. BOGY. I have not withdrawn the call for the yeas and nays. My call for the yeas and nays was seconded and I insist on it.

Mr. RANSOM. I am not disposed to differ with the Chair; but if I understood the colloquy between the Senator from West Virginia and the Chair, this ruling of the Chair is based upon the rule with reference to the proceedings upon constitutional amendments. I infer, therefore, that the Chair holds that when a proposition to amend the Constitution is before the Senate the general parliamentary rules of the Senate are suspended and only the rule adopted by the Senate in reference to constitutional amendments is in force. Now, sir, with very great deference to the Chair I think that the rule requiring a two-thirds vote to make a special order is in force, to all intents, and purposes to the same extent when we are debating or proceeding upon a constitutional amendment as it is when any other matter is being considered; and that the rule first read by the Clerk from the desk, saying that it only requires a majority of the Senate to pass upon any amendment to a constitutional amendment or any matter short of the final question, merely meant to say that on all amendments to, on all intermediate motions relative to such a measure, two-thirds were not necessary. But that rule certainly did not intend, it could not have been contemplated by those who made it, that the general rule requiring two-thirds of the Senate to appoint the time for a special order was abolished. That could not be. The first rule read by the Clerk simply means that it shall not require a two-thirds vote to pass on preliminary motions or amendments to a resolution proposing a constitutional amendment, but it did not and could not mean to say that the standing rule of the Senate requiring a two-thirds vote to make a special order was therefore abolished as to all proceedings pending such a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will observe to the Senator from North Carolina that the rule is not confined to amendments, but extends to all questions save the final question on the passage of a resolution proposing a constitutional amendment. The rule is specific.

Mr. EATON. One word, Mr. President. Our rules provide:

When an amendment to be proposed to the Constitution is under consideration the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present shall not be requisite to decide any question for amendment, or extending to the merits, being short of the final question.

I think the Chair is entirely right. You may say it is in opposition to another standing rule, but this is a standing rule with reference to a particular matter, amendments to the Constitution. The words "extending to the merits," in my judgment, includes everything except the final question, and therefore I think, with great deference to my friend from North Carolina, that the Chair is entirely right in his ruling. I shall, therefore, sustain the ruling of the Chair in this particular.

Mr. RANSOM. I wish my friend would hand me his Manual.

Mr. HARVEY. Is there any question before the Senate? There has been no appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. RANSOM. If the Senator from Kansas desires it I will appeal, in order that I may be heard, though I did not desire to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a point of order. There has been one appeal from the Chair and it has been withdrawn. I submit there cannot be any more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has been no appeal withdrawn that the Chair knows of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] said that he might be driven to an appeal, but he did not appeal.

Mr. RANSOM. I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate to-night, and I would say nothing further upon this question but for the error that I see my friend from Connecticut has fallen into.

Mr. EATON. Into or out of?

Mr. RANSOM. We shall see about that. I would be glad if the Clerk would read again the rule in reference to amendments to the Constitution.

The Chief Clerk read Rule 44, as follows:

44. When an amendment to be proposed to the Constitution is under consideration, the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present shall not be requisite to decide any question for amendments, or extending to the merits, being short of the final question.

Mr. RANSOM. If the Chair for a moment will give his attention to the language of that rule he will see that it is confined to the question of amendments, or questions extending to the merits. Now I ask does the motion to make this resolution the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock refer either to the amendment itself, or to any amendment to the proposition, or to the general merits? If the Senator from Connecticut can see in the motion of the Senator from Vermont to postpone the consideration of this question to, and make it the special order for, to-morrow at one o'clock, anything affecting the amendment itself, or any amendment to the proposition, or the general merits of the proposition, I must submit that I am in error. But I take it that the standing rule of the Senate requiring two-thirds of the Senate to appoint a special order operates as well with regard to proceedings on amendments to the Constitution as it does on any other legislation. Why, sir, suppose a bill to remove political disabilities was up to-day, requiring two-thirds to pass it on its final passage, and a motion was made to make that the special order for to-morrow, would the Chair rule that that motion did not require two-thirds? In an impeachment, which requires a two-thirds vote to convict, would the Chair say that because a majority could take some preliminary step in the proceeding it did not take two-thirds to make a special order in that case?

Mr. EATON. Will my friend permit me?

Mr. RANSOM. With great pleasure.

Mr. EATON. I think I have fallen out of and he has fallen into an error in this——

Mr. RANSOM. I see what my friend is going to say.

Mr. EATON. I think not.

Mr. RANSOM. I know so well what he is going to say that I desire my friend to stop from saying what he is going to say. I think he is going to say that proceedings in cases of impeachment are not exactly as they are in legislative business.

Mr. EATON. That was not what I was going to say at all.

Mr. RANSOM. I know that ought to have been what my friend would say.

Mr. EATON. What I was about to say was this, that the error my friend is falling into is that here are two absolute special rules; and there is one special rule applicable to all general matters it must govern; but where there is another special rule, that rule must govern without regard to the first rule.

Mr. RANSOM. Do I understand my friend from Connecticut to maintain here that when we are proceeding upon a constitutional amendment, the ordinary, the established rules of the Senate are suspended?

Mr. EATON. Certainly. If the rule is a special rule, that rule with regard to constitutional amendments suspends the others.

Mr. RANSOM. It cannot do it, Mr. President. The simple purpose of the rule which has been read by the Clerk was to guard the Senate from falling into the error that it might require two-thirds to pass upon amendments to the general proposition, and nothing more. It meant to save us from that error, and not to say that the ordinary rules of the Senate should be suspended. I withdraw the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator has appealed; I want to say a word.

Mr. RANSOM. I will not withdraw it until I hear from the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, what is the pending question?

Mr. CONKLING. The appeal from the decision of the Chair.

I have very few words to say about this matter. The first thing I have to say is that I will never allow the interest I feel in a measure or the wish that it should be consummated or consummated quickly to induce me to consent to a violation of the rules of the Senate as I believe they are. I understand the present motion to be that on to-morrow at one o'clock this resolution shall be taken up and read the third time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It has been.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator's pardon. I inquire of the Chair whether he is right or I am right? The Senator from New Jersey says it has been read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been. It has been ordered to be read the third time, and the proposition is now to have it read the third time to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. In other words: A matter now pending in the Senate awaits its third reading. It is in order to read it a third time. The motion is that that third reading shall occur at a certain hour to-morrow. The effect of that motion is that at a certain hour to-morrow, without debate, a debatable question shall be decided. Now, Mr. President, in my judgment that is a violation of the rules of this body. There is no previous question here. There is no limit to debate upon a debatable question except the volition of the members of the Senate. The Senate may make a special order by a two-thirds vote. What is that? It is an order of the Senate, specially made, that at a certain hour a certain measure shall be taken up. Taken up with a denial of the right of debate? No, sir. Here is a rule which specifies what it means:

31. When the hour shall arrive for the consideration of a special order, it shall be the duty of the presiding officer to take it up, unless the unfinished business of the preceding day shall be under consideration.

Therefore when the Senate, by a two-thirds vote, under its rule, orders, and orders specially, that a given measure to-morrow at one o'clock shall become a special order, the whole effect of that is to direct the presiding officer then to take it up. Then it is debatable, as much as if it were taken up at any other time and in any other way.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to ask the Senator from New York if, after the Senate has ordered the third reading of a bill, debate is in order before that third reading is had?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly not, if I understand how this question now stands. I may entirely misunderstand the whole thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then it is debatable at this moment.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly it is not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are you doing now? You are debating the point of order now.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me see whether the Chair and I are both wrong about this. I understand from Senators now that the vote has been taken on ordering this resolution to a third reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the reason then that the third reading has not been ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate have ordered the third reading, and the Senator from Vermont has moved that the third reading shall take place to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. But has the third reading been ordered?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I have been wrong in very much that I have been saying, and I have no excuse to submit for it except that when my friend from New Jersey corrected me, (and he was quite right and I was quite wrong,) I asked the Chair whether this resolution had been ordered to a third reading and the Chair said "no," as I understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from New York to ask whether it had been read a third time, and the Chair answered "no."

Mr. CONKLING. Ah, that is the distinction. Then I was quite mistaken. Now let me correct myself. If the Senate has voted that this resolution shall be read the third time, the Senator from Vermont is quite right, his idea being that no debate is in order until it is read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS. Or any other business.

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir, not as I understand it. It is in order for any Senator to move that the Senate adjourn, it is in order to make a motion for a recess or to go into executive session, that the bill be indefinitely postponed or postponed to a day certain. Thinking the Senator from Vermont had moved that its third reading be postponed to a day certain, I arose to address the Chair, but it entirely saves me from the very great discomfit I have had in supposing that we were likely to do a thing which to me was not warranted by the rule. I supposed the motion was to postpone the third reading of the bill, thereby meaning that the bill be read at one o'clock, and that then that motion, confessedly debatable in itself, should be taken up without debate, and the Senate proceed to vote upon it. I find I am entirely mistaken and I wish to withdraw whatever I have said.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? From the statements which have been presented by himself it will require a two-thirds vote to postpone this until to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not think so, because I do not understand the motion to be that it be made a special order. Were that the motion it would undoubtedly require a two-thirds vote, but the motion is simply that it be postponed from this hour on this parliamentary day until one o'clock on the next parliamentary day, and that the next step, to wit, the Secretary rising and reading it the third time, shall not take place until then. That I think is a motion to postpone, and I have no doubt a majority is competent to postpone it.

Mr. BOGY. But it is to make it a special order.

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir; I do not understand that to be a special order.

Mr. GORDON. If I understand the reading of these rules at all, the effect of this vote is to make the resolution the special order for 1 o'clock to-morrow. Our rules provide:

When two or more subjects shall have been specially assigned for consideration, they shall take precedence according to the order of time at which they were severally assigned.

It occurs to me if this vote shall be had and this resolution shall be ordered to be read a third time to-morrow at one o'clock, it takes precedence at that hour over all other orders, and therefore is a special order. What is a special order except an order which shall be considered at the hour specified? Special order means an order specified according to the hour at which the vote of the Senate shall be taken. If we determine here to-night that this resolution shall be read at a specific hour, what else have we done but made it the special order for that hour? I confess that I am unable to understand this rule as meaning anything short of that or anything beyond it. What is the rule as to special orders?

No bill, joint resolution, or other subject shall be made a special order for a particular day and hour—without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present.

For a particular hour—

This is a joint resolution. It is proposed to make it a special order, because the reading of it is to take precedence at one o'clock to-morrow over everything else that may be then before the Senate. As to the qualification which my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] thinks is put upon that general rule by the rule in reference to amendments to the Constitution, let me say one word:

When an amendment to be proposed to the Constitution is under consideration the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present shall not be requisite to decide any question for amendments, or extending to the merits, being short of the final question.

If a motion to make this the special order for to-morrow or to have this to go to the third reading at one o'clock to-morrow changes in any respect this amendment to the Constitution, if it makes it less effective, if it makes it broader in its application to schools, if it looks to the merits of the resolution in any direction, then certainly my friend from Connecticut and the Chair would be correct, in my judgment; but is it possible for the Senate to construe the motion of the Senator from Vermont to fix one o'clock to-morrow as looking to the merits of this question? Not by any means. It is nothing more nor less, if language means anything, than fixing this amendment to the Constitution as a special order for one o'clock to-morrow; and the motion does not look to any extent to the merits of this question.

I trust the Senate will not commit, as I consider, one of the most grievous blunders we can possibly make, in overriding one of the established rules of the Senate in order to accomplish this purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. For one I do not wish to override the established rules of the Senate to accomplish any purpose, much less this one, because a purpose so good and beneficent as this ought not to depend upon any devious methods. If I could be tempted to override a rule of the Senate it would not be on a measure like this. But I respectfully submit, and I am going to be very brief, that my friend from Georgia misapprehends the question, and if he will give me the honor of hearing me, I think I can convince him of it.

Mr. GORDON. With great pleasure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we had a public library where sectarian teaching did or did not exist, that was lighted so that we could have it open in the evening and get out books when we sit evenings, I think I should be able to convince my friend from Georgia and everybody else by authority that this is a perfectly parliamentary motion to make, one of ordinary and frequent practice in parliamentary bodies, and that it is not a special order in the sense of the rules at all. The parliamentary law is, according to my recollection, but I cannot prove it at this moment, for the reason that I have stated, and I speak with some confidence, that a bill having gone to the stage of being ordered to be read a third time, then it may be read the third time at that moment, as is usually the motion in the House of Representatives, that it be read the third time now. When no other motion intervenes it is taken for granted here always that the bill is read the third time when it is ordered to be read a third time. The Senate has made that order already. The question is, when shall the order be executed? It may be executed now or at any other time the Senate fixes for doing the particular thing that it has ordered it will do. It has already ordered that this resolution shall be read a third time. It has not ordered that it shall be considered, but that a simple act about it, a parliamentary act which it has ordered, a lawful act, shall take place. Then the question is when? Somebody says "now," in a parliamentary body. Somebody says "two hours hence;" somebody says "to-morrow." Sometimes they frequently say in Parliament "this day week," which is a very common motion. That being the state of the parliamentary law, of course it is perfectly in order to fix a time.

My friend's only difficulty then, if I understand him, is that that makes it a special order within the meaning of the rules. The rules have grown up with this parliamentary law and usage, which was perfectly well understood and fixed; and the Senator on inquiring even of persons now present who have long been in the executive offices of the Senate will ascertain that in not very old times it used to be a common practice not to read the bill a third time at the moment, but lay it aside and read it afterward at some convenient time, the next day or whenever it might happen, with this rule for a special order standing just as it does now. I think my friend's mistake is that he forgets that proceeding to the consideration of a bill not before the Senate, to take it up, to go on with it, making it a special order to supersede other business, is one thing, while when you have a bill under consideration, having ordered already that a particular thing shall be done with it, merely fixing the time when that order shall be executed, is just like fixing the time when any other order of the Senate may be executed, as we, I suppose, everybody will agree, without a two-thirds vote may order that to-morrow at one o'clock we shall take a recess for one hour, or make any other order respecting the course of our proceeding, make the order now and fix the time and the circumstances that order shall be executed. That is my opinion. I believe it has been the practice whenever it was convenient to have it the practice with this rule, and I think it was never understood before that it violated it.

The first point that was made about its not being a motion that could be made as cutting off debate has already been disposed of, because it does not cut off debate, because the resolution is not debatable now until it is read the third time. It is merely fixing the time when its third reading shall take place, and then the question of passage is open to debate.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the Senator from Vermont to distinguish between this vote and a vote making a special order of the consideration of a bill or resolution. If it were the latter, if it were making a special order, then whether it should be executed to-morrow at one o'clock would depend upon the question whether there was unfinished business before the Senate or not; but if I understand the Senator, if the Senate directs by a majority vote that this resolution have its third reading to-morrow at one o'clock, that order must be executed to-morrow at that time, no matter what may be the state of business before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I think.

Mr. HOWE. I am not prepared to controvert that view of the case. If that is the true view, then unquestionably the ruling of the Chair is right.

Mr. RANSOM. I must again ask pardon of the Senate for taking up so much of its time upon this matter; but I cannot help feeling concerned upon any question that touches an amendment to the Constitution. I confess I feel serious as soon as any amendment to the Constitution is read. I understood the Senator from Vermont to say that as this proposition had been ordered to a third reading, it was then in the power of the Senate by a bare majority to postpone the consideration of the vote upon the question to any future hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; I did not say that at all.

Mr. RANSOM. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I said, and I repeat, exactly this, and I state the proposition with as much precision as I am capable of, that the Senate having ordered that this resolution be read a third time, it is competent for a majority of the Senate to fix the day, hour, minute, and second at which that order shall be executed; that is all.

Mr. RANSOM. That is what I intended to say was the position of the Senator from Vermont. Now, if that be so, I desire to know what there is in the proposition ordering a bill to a third reading materially different from any other proposition before the Senate. To have a vote taken to-morrow at one o'clock would be a special order. If the motion had been made in so many words by the Senator from Vermont or by any other Senator to make this question the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock, that would be a special order and it would require a two-thirds vote. "But," says the Senator from Vermont—I do not profess to quote his language, but I think I give the substance of his remark—"this proposition having been ordered to a third reading, I can accomplish the purpose by a different motion; I can practically secure a special order; I can rule that the vote on this question shall be taken to-morrow at one o'clock, and while that motion has all the effect of a special order, while it gives this proposition precedence over every other question before the Senate to-morrow at one o'clock, while it virtually makes it a special order, simply because the Senate has ordered it to a third reading, the rule is changed and it only requires a majority." Is there any difference in this respect between a measure being ordered to a third reading and occupying any other position before the Senate? Is there any difference between a proposition that a bill shall be ordered to a third reading to-morrow at one o'clock and a proposition to take up any other question at that time? Is there any special privilege, is there any special character, is there any extraordinary dignity attached to the motion ordering a bill to its third reading that gives it a different character from any other proposition before the Senate? Will the Senator from Vermont say that it is because the resolution has been ordered to a third reading, and debate is stopped, and it is not debatable? Suppose a motion had been made to lay this resolution on the table. That would stop debate. Suppose then a motion had been made to take the vote to-morrow at one o'clock, would it not have been a special order? Unless the Chair can decide that a motion that a bill be read the third time is a different motion, a different proceeding from any other one within the rules of the Senate, I do not see how this proposition can be passed without a vote of two-thirds of the Senate.

Mr. NORWOOD. I invite the attention of the Senator from Vermont to Rule 31:

When the hour shall arrive for the consideration of a special order, it shall be the duty of the presiding officer to take it up, unless the unfinished business of the preceding day shall be under consideration.

I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont if his motion is carried into effect, when the hour of one o'clock arrives to-morrow under what rule will his motion take effect? Will it be by virtue of the resolution having been made a special order? If not, under what rule and how will the Senate proceed to consider it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Under precisely the same rule that to-morrow at one o'clock, if it is so ordered to-night, we shall take a recess for fifteen minutes.

Mr. NORWOOD. That is one thing; that is not legislation. These rules apply to legislation, and the honorable Senator cannot draw the analogy between that case and his resolution. They apply to the consideration of bills or of joint resolutions, because the rule applies to bills or joint resolutions, or other subjects-matter of legislation. I will ask the Senator from Vermont, if he will give me his attention again, would the Chair call up this matter to-morrow as a special order to be considered by the Senate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What the Chair would do undoubtedly would be what he always does, and that is to execute the order of the Senate. I have no doubt the Chair would say, "The hour having arrived at which this resolution was ordered to be read a third time, that order will be executed," and then it would be read the third time.

Mr. NORWOOD. Would that take precedence of any other business at that time, and if so, by virtue of what rule? It would not come under any rule that made it a special order; the Senator admits that. I want to know by what rule that order would then take precedence before any other business before the Senate? Where is the general parliamentary rule? We are proceeding under special standing rules, and we are considering standing rules. We have standing rules, and we have standing rules that apply to this very case. The standing rule here is that—

No bill, joint resolution—

Which is this case—

or other subject shall be made a special order for a particular day and hour—

Which is the motion of the Senator from Vermont—

without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present.

If that is not a special order under Rule 31, which it would be the duty of the Chair to call up when the hour of one shall arrive to-morrow, under what standing rule of the Senate will the Chair proceed to call it up? Is there any general parliamentary rule, as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut, which overrides a standing rule of the Senate? The standing rule requires the Chair to call up a special order at a given hour. The Senator from Connecticut says that the general parliamentary law would regulate it; in other words, that the standing rule shall give way to a general rule. I think that the Senator from North Carolina is entirely correct, that, this being a joint resolution, if we propose to fix a particular day and hour for its consideration, that is a motion to make it a special order which requires the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present to do it. As was said by my friend, this motion does not affect any amendment to this resolution, nor does it affect the merits of the question, as is provided for under Rule 44. I cannot see why this will not be a special order, and if it be a special order it will be the duty of the Chair to call it up at the hour named to-morrow; and under Rule 31 it will take precedence of all other business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to Rule 11, on page 133 of the Manual:

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn;
To proceed to the consideration of executive business;
To lay on the table;
To postpone indefinitely;
To postpone to a day certain.

This last is one of the motions that is in order, and certainly it does not require anything more than a majority.

Mr. RANSOM. Will the Senator from New Jersey hear me for a second? If this was a motion to postpone to a day certain, without giving to that motion, as I understand the Senator from Vermont does give to it and the Chair gives to it, the character of a special order, then there could be no controversy about a bare majority being sufficient to carry it; but as I have understood the Senator from Vermont and as I have understood the Chair, it has been insisted that while this was not a special order, still to-morrow it would take precedence of every other motion and have to be voted on at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will correct the Senator so far as the Chair is concerned. The Chair has not stated that this would be in the light of a special order.

Mr. RANSOM. If the Chair had stated in the beginning that this was simply a motion to postpone until to-morrow, and that then the resolution would take its ordinary fate in the proceedings of this body, I should not have appealed from the decision of the Chair, for that was the manifest decision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from North Carolina that the Chair took particular pains, as the Senator from West Virginia will remember, and did not rule on a suppositious case. The Chair ruled upon the rule bearing upon constitutional amendments. The Chair has in no instance, as the official report will verify, characterized this as a special order. This is executing an order of the Senate, a postponement of the third reading of this resolution. The Senate has to-day ordered the third reading, and the Senator from Vermont has moved to postpone its third reading until one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HOWE. I am satisfied, upon looking at Mr. Cushing's treatise, that this motion is not a motion to make a special order. Mr. Cushing says:

2210. The motion that the bill or the bill with the amendments, as the case may be, be engrossed, may be made immediately upon the conclusion of the proceedings on the report or afterward, as may be convenient. On this motion the merits of the bill may be discussed; and if it is negatived the bill is lost; if decided in the affirmative, it may be followed up by a motion for the third reading of the bill, on a particular day, or on a particular day if then engrossed.

2214. The order for the engrossment of a bill is sometimes in the simple form that the bill be engrossed; sometimes it is accompanied by an order for the third reading; sometimes for the third reading on a particular day; or on a particular day if the bill should then be engrossed. If no order is made as to the time for the third reading it may take place as soon as the bill is engrossed; if the time has been fixed the third reading is an order of the day for the day so agreed upon, and to be proceeded with accordingly.

2215. The next step to be taken after the engrossment or after the report, or proceedings on the report, of a bill already engrossed, is the third reading. If a bill from the other House is reported from the committee without amendment, being already engrossed, it may be read a third time immediately, or it may be ordered to be read a third time, without any time being fixed therefor; or the time may be fixed for a future day. If a bill from the other House is reported from the committee with amendments, the same proceedings may take place upon it with reference to a third reading, at the termination of the proceedings upon the report.

* * * * * * * *

In the House of Representatives of the United States it appears to be the custom to engross bills in advance of their being ordered to be engrossed; and if a bill happens to be thus engrossed, it may be read a third time immediately; otherwise this motion—

That is, if it is not already engrossed—

except in the case of a bill from the other branch—which is already engrossed—is not in order; nor, without a suspension of the rules, can an unengrossed bill be read a third time.

2217. When a time has been previously fixed for the third reading, the third reading becomes an order of the day for the day appointed, and is proceeded with accordingly. (Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, pages 858–861.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In that connection the Chair will state to the Senator from Wisconsin that the practice is to state that a bill being ordered to be engrossed and read the third time will be read the third time, not waiting for the formal engrossment. That has been the practice, and therefore it comes within the rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. By unanimous consent that is done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is done by unanimous consent. The actual engrossment is scarcely ever required.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. RANSOM. Understanding now that the Chair considers this as a simple motion to postpone until to-morrow at one o'clock, without giving the resolution the character of a special order at that hour, I withdraw the appeal, because from that ruling I never would have dissented if I had understood it so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the reporter's notes will verify what he now says.

Mr. RANSOM. I will not doubt it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was very particular to state it. The record will show that the Chair is correct.

Mr. RANSOM. I understood the Chair to rule differently.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is there anything before the Senate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is now the pending question? My motion, is it not, the appeal being withdrawn?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The appeal is withdrawn, and the Chair rules that the motion is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that my motion be put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the third reading of the bill be fixed for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. BOGY. I had called for the yeas and nays on that motion, and as no notice was taken of it some mistake must have been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the third reading of the joint resolution until one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BOGY. I called for the yeas and nays awhile ago and the demand was sustained. The Chair, for some reason which I cannot explain, (and there is no reflection at all upon the Chair,) put the vote without regarding that order; and the same thing is now being done again. Therefore as a matter of right, as a Senator on this floor, I again call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will simply say that there has been so much intervening since that the Chair lost sight of it, as he did before, supposing the Senator had withdrawn the call but found he did not. The Chair will now put the question and the roll-call will proceed. Shall the third reading of this resolution be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock?

Mr. CONKLING. I ask leave to state that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREERY] has been kind enough to pair with me, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] unites with me in pairing with the Senator from Kentucky, so as to make the pair even to take effect to-morrow at one o'clock, if I am not able then to be in the Senate. The Senator from Massachusetts and myself would vote "yea" on the resolution, and the Senator from Kentucky would vote "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Spencer, Wadleigh, and West—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Gordon, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Ransom, and Stevenson—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hamlin, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McDonald, Merrimon, Morton, Norwood, Randolph, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—31.

So the motion of Mr. EDMUNDS was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I rise to suggest to the Senator from California that it is now quite late for him to take up his bill. The other day the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] called up the election law and it was informally laid aside in order that an amendment might be prepared. I would suggest to the Senator from California that that subject be taken up now and disposed of. It has already been fully debated and I do not suppose it will lead to any discussion. If it shall, it shall not interfere with the Senator's bill.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Hawaiian bill remains the unfinished business for to-morrow, I am willing that the other matter shall go on to-night.

Mr. LOGAN. I object to any bargain being made. I have another matter to bring up.

Mr. SARGENT. I will refer the Senator from New Jersey to the Senator from Illinois. I cannot yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I can get along with him very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent that the Hawaiian bill be considered the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. PATTERSON. I object.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I move to take up the bill now.

Mr. WEST. Is a motion to adjourn in order?

Mr. SARGENT. Not while I have the floor.

Mr. WEST. You cannot keep the floor while the Chair is putting the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California has made his motion.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to make a statement in reference to this matter, as to the position of it, and would have interrupted the Chair to do so if it were allowable.

The position of the bill is this: A motion was made when this bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations to refer it to the Committee on Finance. I understand that motion will not now be pressed. That motion was made and carried in my absence. When I came into the Senate I found it had been done, and I at once entered a motion to reconsider. The matter which I wish to take up is the motion to reconsider and have it disposed of, so as to bring the bill before the Senate. Therefore the motion which I want to bring up is my motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Now, Mr. President, I want to appeal to the generosity of the Senate on behalf of the people of the Pacific coast that this measure be acted on. I know the Senator from Louisiana is opposed to the bill. I know that he wants to debate it, and beat it if he can. That is fair warfare. I will not complain of that; but I do say that after I have stood here for several weeks and asked that I might have a hearing on this matter, when telegrams come from business men on our coast stating that the suspense is ruining them, it is mere fairness that the matter should be considered. Let those who are opposed to it vote against it; let those who desire to speak against it so speak; but I do ask that the measure be heard.

I should like to make one other remark personal to myself. For at least three weeks of this session I have been out of the Senate during its business hours busy with your work, almost like a slave, upon committees of conference; and it seems to me that during the few brief hours that I have now before I am compelled to go into committee again, I might have the indulgence of having this matter considered.

I put it upon personal grounds; I put it furthermore on the interests of our coast, which are jeoparded by this delay. I am simply asking for an opportunity to be heard. The executive department negotiated this treaty with the authorities of the Sandwich Islands. It was ratified by the Senate. The House of Representatives has passed the appropriate legislation and it is here before us. The Parliament of Hawaii have passed that legislation. The treaty has been proclaimed by both powers. Now all that remains is that the Senate carry out the promise that it seemed to imply when it ratified the treaty by the adoption of this legislation. If the Senate shall have changed its mind and thinks there is no obligation on it to stand by that action, I can only acquiesce, and my people of course will have to submit in silence, and I believe they will submit respectfully; but it is better for them, as I said this morning, that the matter be disposed of, even if the bill be defeated, than to have it hanging over their heads, unsettling their business interests, and making every man uncertain what he ought to do with regard to his business.

Now I appeal to the Senator from Louisiana or any other Senator to not by a motion to adjourn or otherwise cut off an opportunity to have this heard, that he do not insist upon that course, but allow the matter to be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. LOGAN. I think we might possibly make an arrangement to which all the Senators present would agree. I have no objection to the Senator's bill being taken up; I am for the bill, and shall vote for it; but I can say the same that has been said by the Senator in reference to my efforts in regard to another bill. I have asked for two months a vote on a bill in the Senate, and when the Senate reconsiders this proposition that the Senator from California desires to take up to-morrow, and I will aid him to take it up to-morrow, I will ask the Senate as I did to-day to vote on the bill to which I refer. I want to say now to Senators on both sides that we ought at least to have an opportunity of voting and recording ourselves either for or against this bill that was denominated this morning by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] as a bill in such condition that it could not be licked into shape, that could not be arranged, prepared, fixed in such shape as that the Senate ought to vote on it. It is House bill No. 58, known as the bounty bill.

I desire to say that on both sides of this Chamber if men are held by any obligations, although it is not a political measure, both political parties of this country have pledged themselves time and again in their platforms, which seem to be nought but things made to be spit upon, that they would give to the soldiers of this country that which was given them by the laws of the country. Both parties have said that. Five times this bill has passed the House of Representatives, four times a republican House, and once it passed both Houses and was vetoed. It now has been passed by one branch of Congress and is waiting the assent of the other. I do say to Senators on both sides, Senators who have stood here and spoken of the rights of persons and claimants that were entitled to money from the Government who have been deprived of it by non-action on the part of the Congress of the United States, that it is a duty we owe to these men to vote on this bill; I do not say to pass it, to vote but either for it and let it become a law, or against it so that it will not become a law, and let them know it.

This bill provides for the payment to the soldiers of the late war of that which the laws of the United States promised them should be paid, but, as I said to-day, by certain orders in reference to their muster-out, they were deprived of that which they were entitled to under the laws of Congress. I want to appeal to the Senate of the United States whether the argument that has been made against this bill on account of the amount it will take out of the Treasury in the next seven or eight years—for it will take that long probably for all to be paid—is a good argument provided the claim is honest? I have heard the argument made here where large amounts were claimed for the loss of property that the Government justly owed the money; that it was repudiation of its honest debts if it failed to pay. Now I say it is repudiation on the part of the Congress of the United States of that which it honestly owes to the defenders of this country unless we pass this bill and pay them what we promised to pay them.

This is all I have to say, except to make a motion that the Senate take up this bill and act on it, House bill No. 58, commonly known as the bounty bill, and I ask a vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from California has been made and takes precedence.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; his motion was to reconsider.

Mr. SARGENT. My motion was to take up the motion which I entered the other day to reconsider the vote by which the Hawaiian bill was referred to the Committee on Finance. That brings the bill before the Senate by the reconsideration taking place, and I am informed by the Senator from Vermont who made the motion to refer, [Mr. MORRILL,] that he does not intend to press it.

Mr. LOGAN. I am willing, as far as I am concerned, that the vote may be considered reconsidered.

Mr. GORDON. I think it is very clear that we shall not do any business to-night. I move, therefore, that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator allow me to move an executive session?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me to make an informal report from a conference committee?

Mr. GORDON. I have yielded to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WINDOM. I present a report from the committee of conference on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SARGENT. What is the pending motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is objection, the Senator from California has moved to take up the motion to reconsider——

Mr. PATTERSON. There is objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There can be no objection to that. The Senator from California asks a vote on his motion. The Senator from Georgia moved to adjourn, but yielded to the Senator from Rhode Island, and the Senator from Rhode Island yielded to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator from Georgia after he made his motion yielded, he has lost the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair is ruling.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senate——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He yielded to the Senator from Rhode Island, and the Senator from Rhode Island yielded to the Senator from Minnesota, and the Senator from Minnesota rose not to a privileged motion. He presents a report of a conference committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. If we are going into this kind of tactics I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island to withdraw that motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would withdraw it, but the Senator from Illinois, if I withdraw it, says I have yielded the floor, and he brings up his motion.

Mr. SARGENT. But I have not yielded the floor on my motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not bring in any motion, but I said the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. ANTHONY. Informally for a conference report.

Mr. LOGAN. But "informally" is not allowable.

Mr. ANTHONY. If we are going on strict parliamentary law I shall move an executive session; but I am willing to have the vote taken on the motion of the Senator from California if the Senator from Georgia is willing.

Mr. GORDON. That cannot be had without debate.

Mr. SARGENT. We can vote down the motion to adjourn and the motion for an executive session.

Mr. PADDOCK. Who holds the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moved to take up the motion to reconsider the reference of the Hawaiian bill, pending which the Senator from Georgia moved to adjourn; he withdrew that motion and yielded to the Senator from Rhode Island, and the Senator from Rhode Island yielded to the Senator from Minnesota. Objection being made to the request of the Senator from Minnesota, thereupon the Senator from California insisted on his motion, but his came first. Therefore the motion of the Senator from California is pending unless the Senator from Rhode Island——

Mr. ANTHONY. I took the floor by consent of the Senator from Georgia to make a motion to go into executive session. If I cannot make that motion I will yield to him to make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. LOGAN. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his question of order.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state it. It is that when the Senator from Georgia yielded the floor he lost the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has so ruled.

Mr. LOGAN. And when the Senator from Rhode Island yielded the floor, he also lost it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair has ruled.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I insist that another Senator had the floor, addressed the Chair, was recognized, and that the Senator from Rhode Island cannot now make his motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair stated that the motion of the Senator from California was in order unless there was some privileged motion which cut it off.

Mr. SARGENT. I hope we may have a vote.

Mr. GORDON. Is not the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island a privileged motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island yielded. If he makes the motion the Chair will entertain it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I had no right to yield the floor except that I did so in accordance with that courtesy which is always extended to a report from a committee of conference; but I took it by the assent of the Senator from Georgia, who moved to adjourn and agreed that I might substitute the motion to go into executive session. If I cannot have that motion put, then I must yield the floor to my friend from Georgia to make his motion to adjourn, which I hope will be voted down, and that then we shall go into executive session. We ought to have an executive session this evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair following the practice referred to recognized the Senator from Minnesota; but objection was made, and it became the duty of the Chiar before he recognized the——

Mr. WINDOM. I ask consent to make a very brief statement for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Now the Senator from Rhode Island, as the Chair understands, asks that he may surrender to the Senator from Georgia. Is there objection?

Mr. LOGAN. Surrender what?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to go into executive session.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand the rules of this Senate to give the floor to the Senator who addresses the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asked if there was objection. The Senator from Illinois objects. The Chair will now put the question.

Mr. LOGAN. I made no objection; I merely asked that the rule be enforced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from California, who moves to take up a motion to reconsider the vote on the Hawaiian treaty bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, (at ten o'clock p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, if the Senator will allow my motion to go into executive session, I will not yield the floor to anybody.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SARGENT. I hope that will be voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ANTHONY. There ought to be an executive session this evening.

Mr. SARGENT. I think we can have an executive session; but I insist on my rights first.

The motion was not agreed to; ayes 15, less than a majority of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California to proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote on the Hawaiian treaty bill.

Mr. NORWOOD. I ask the Senator from California if he proposes to go on with that to-night?

Mr. SARGENT. I am not particular about it. I want it taken up.

Mr. NORWOOD. The Senator simply wants the reconsideration ordered now?

Mr. SARGENT. I want to reconsider the vote and leave the bill pending as the unfinished business.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the Senator from California that he simply move to discharge the Committee on Finance and withdraw his motion to reconsider.

Mr. SARGENT. I am not particular; any way to bring the bill before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. It never has been considered by the Committee on Finance, though we have had ample time to do it, because the motion to reconsider had been entered.

Mr. SARGENT. I will put it in that shape.

Mr. MORRILL. I regret very much the committee has not had the bill under consideration, because I think there are some amendments the committee would undoubtedly have reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California change his motion.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not see the particular parliamentary point, but I suppose discharging the committee will answer the same purpose, and I will make that motion, if the Senator prefers that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the Hawaiian treaty bill.

The motion was agreed to.

THE HAWAIIAN TREATY.

Mr. SARGENT. Now I move that the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875, be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee have been discharged, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to make the bill—I believe that is in accord with the wishes of the Senator—the special order.

Mr. SARGENT. No, that would be set aside by unfinished business. I am satisfied with the position of the bill now.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, then, I move to take up House bill No. 58.

Mr. SARGENT. That would set aside this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I know that; if you are not going on with it that is what I propose to do.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to violate any understanding. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. NORWOOD] asked me a question, to which I replied that I was willing that this bill should go over as the unfinished business to to-morrow.

Mr. WEST. I rise to a point of order that this having now been reported by a committee to-day, or rather the committee having been just discharged, which is equivalent to a report, its consideration is not in order if a single objection is raised.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order if the bill has been reported to-day.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the attention of the Chair for a moment. This bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations May 15, 1876. It has never been before the Finance Committee. If the Senator from Vermont intended that by his motion, then I ask that the motion be reconsidered whereby the committee was discharged.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands this is not a report of a committee, but is a discharge of a committee, and the bill is before the Senate. The Chair overrules the point of order understanding the status of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Now I am willing to carry out the understanding of the Senator from Georgia. I am willing to go on with some remarks or I will yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Go on now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. Am I not in order in presenting the report of a conference committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate allow the report to be received? Is there unanimous consent for the Senator from Minnesota to make a report?

Mr. SARGENT. Provided it does not displace this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent would not displace it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is the Indian appropriation bill. I object.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. While the galleries are being cleared I am satisfied that if I can be heard in a very brief statement the Indian bill may be acted on. I do not desire to have the report read, but information has been received by the committees of conference both of the Senate and House which makes it necessary that the report should be non-concurred in and a new committee appointed. It is not necessary to read the report; but both committees desire that the Senate shall non-concur in the report and that a new committee be appointed consisting of the same members. I move that the Senate non-concur in the report of the committee of conference and again insist on its amendments and ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. KERNAN were appointed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-three minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened; and (at ten o'clock and forty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 11, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. L. STERN, minister of the Washington Hebrew congregation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 4087) continuing the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

INDIAN SCOUTS.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 1007) concerning the employment of Indian scouts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read. It repeals so much of the Army appropriation act of July 24, 1876, as limits the number of Indian scouts to three hundred, and continues in force sections 1094 and 1112 of the Revised Statutes, authorizing the employment of one thousand Indian scouts. It also provides that a proportionate number of non-commissioned officers may be appointed. The scouts, when they furnish their own horses and horse-equipments, are to be entitled to receive forty cents per day for their use and risk so long as thus employed.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is this a proposition to increase the force of the Army?

Mr. BANNING. It is not. I think the gentleman will make no objection to the bill when it is explained.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I reserve the right to object until some explanation is made.

Mr. BANNING. At the assembling of Congress this session section 1094 of the Revised Statutes permitted the employment in time of war of one thousand Indian scouts, and section 1112 of the Revised Statutes required that those scouts should be discharged immediately upon the end of Indian hostilities. The Army appropriation bill passed this session provided for only three hundred. More than three hundred at that time were employed and being used in the expedition against the Sioux. The passage of that bill cut off the pay of part of these men that are now in the field against the Sioux Indians. The Secretary of War and the General of the Army have requested Congress to fix the number of Indian scouts as they were under section 1094 of the Revised Statutes before the convening of this Congress at one thousand in time of Indian hostilities. It will be necessary to do this to pay part of the scouts that were employed before the Army bill passed fixing the number at three hundred.

Mr. HURLBUT. Will the gentleman also state that this will not increase the number of the Army?

Mr. BANNING. I was about to state that. It will not increase the number of the Army one. It simply re-enacts the law which permitted the General of the Army to employ as many as one thousand Indian scouts in time of actual hostilities. As soon as hostilities are over the statute requires that they shall be mustered out. I will read the statute which this bill re-enacts:

> The President is authorized to enlist a force of Indians not exceeding one thousand, who shall act as scouts in the Territories and Indian country. They shall be discharged when the necessity for their service shall cease or at the discretion of the department commander.

The appropriation bill which we passed provided the pay of only three hundred of these men. This is a re-enactment of that law. These scouts are now in the service performing duty under Terry and Crook, and I hope the bill will be passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Alabama insist on his objection?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I do not.

Mr. EDEN. I understand that these scouts are to be used only during the Indian war?

Mr. BANNING. Yes, sir; only temporarily during the Indian hostilities.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EASTERN BAND OF CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I ask that by unanimous consent the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3687) to authorize and enable the eastern band of the Cherokee Indians to institute and prosecute a suit in the Court of Claims against the Cherokee Nation, and that it be brought before the House for present consideration. This bill is reported unanimously by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I hope there will be no objection to its now being put upon its passage.

Mr. EDEN and Mr. FORT reserved the right to object until the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair always when unanimous consent is asked reserves the right of any gentleman to object until the bill is read.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at this time?

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to the consideration of any bill on the Private Calendar.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. If the gentleman will allow me to make a statement I am satisfied he will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection has been made.

C. M. WILCOX.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Judiciary, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3083) to remove the political disabilities of C. M. Wilcox, of Maryland. It is accompanied by a petition and is reported by the Judiciary Committee unanimously.

The bill was read.

Mr. HURLBUT. Is there a petition accompanying the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia has so stated.

Mr. HUNTON. I hold the petition in my hand, and will have it read if the gentleman desires.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not ask for the reading of the petition.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof.)

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS' HOMES.

Mr. TERRY. I rise to a privileged question. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report the resolution that I send to the Clerk's desk, and to ask its passage.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, authorized to continue their investigations into the management and control of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers during the vacation of Congress, and to ascertain what reforms in the same are necessary, and that said committee be authorized to make such investigations through subcommittees, who may visit said homes; and that such subcommittees be authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and do all such other acts as may be necessary for a full and complete inquiry into the management and control of said homes, and make due report of the same.

Mr. HALE. I must object to that resolution.

Mr. TERRY. The resolution is not open to objection. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs, and under the ruling made yesterday upon a point of order it is not open to objection.

Mr. HALE. It certainly will not be claimed that this is a report of the committee of investigation. It is a proposition to confer new powers upon a committee and to authorize them to sit during the recess of Congress.

Mr. TERRY. This is the unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the object of it is to ask power to continue with the investigation heretofore ordered by Congress but which it has been impossible to complete during the present session.

Mr. HALE. It is a proposition to enable the committee to sit during the recess.

Mr. TERRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Then I emphatically object.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman has no right to object to it, and I ask its adoption.

Mr. HALE. It is not before the House if there is a single objection.

Mr. TERRY. I claim that it is before the House as a privileged question under the resolution adopted by the House on Monday last.

Mr. HALE. That would be an expansion of last Monday's resolution which would require a great deal of imagination.

Mr. RANDALL. Under the resolution of Monday last they can report the resolution.

Mr. HALE. They can report the result of their investigation, but nothing of this kind.

Mr. RANDALL. This is like any other report which comes from an investigating committee.

Mr. HALE. The committee have only a right to report resolutions putting in force the result of their investigation.

Mr. RANDALL. The character of the resolution is another question.

Mr. HALE. I am perfectly willing to leave the matter to the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not assume to control a matter so entirely a matter of fact and understanding, and will submit the question to the House.

Mr. HALE. This is a very important matter, and in order that it may be understood I call for a second reading of the resolution. But before that is done, sir, let me say to the other side of the House and notify them that upon the question of giving these investigating committees authority to sit after Congress has adjourned and at any time to expose to the country what they choose, I think I represent the united sentiment of this side of the House, and that we will not, if there is anything in parliamentary power, permit. I am justified in saying this now. The gentlemen can begin, if they choose, this attempt to take an unfair advantage of the minority, but I notify them that in doing so they enter upon a long lane.

Mr. TERRY. I desire to say that there have been a great number of complaints presented to the Committee on Military Affairs in reference to the treatment of the inmates of the soldiers' homes, and it has been impracticable to bring all of the complainants here.

Mr. PAGE. Is this matter before the House for debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. TERRY. I only wish to add that the investigation can be more satisfactorily made at the several soldiers' homes.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman and all the gentlemen on the Committee on Military Affairs have had nearly nine months to make this investigation, and we have made arrangements for their report to come in at any time; but it seems, Mr. Speaker, that every concession made by this side of the House as to the admission of these reports is to be followed by new demands. It did not occur, sir, to me the other day, when we made the arrangement of which the House is aware, that we should be so soon as this asked, or sought to be driven, to consent to a committee meeting during the recess. Now, we, on this side of the House, cannot and will not consent to that.

Mr. RANDALL. This is the only committee that has asked that privilege.

Mr. HALE. But how do we know how soon such another request will follow?

Mr. BANNING. The gentleman from Maine said that he represented the united sentiment of that side of the House.

Mr. HALE. I said that I thought I did.

Mr. BANNING. This resolution is unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE. I should be glad to hear from some member of the minority of the committee on that point.

Mr. HURLBUT. It was a part of the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs to report in regard to these homes for the disabled soldiers of the country. I believe this report to be strictly fair. The complaints in regard to these homes did not come to us in any organized form, but letters were sent to the committee alleging on the part of certain persons, inmates of these homes, that wrongs had been done to them. I understand the committee to concur in this report, but I have never understood that the entire committee concurred in the propriety of carrying on an investigation during the vacation for the reason that it is practically impossible that any member of the committee should serve upon the committee at that time.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman from Virginia will leave out that part of the resolution which authorizes the committee to sit during the recess I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the examination go on at the next session.

Mr. BANNING. One word in explanation of what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT.] So far as I understand, this report with the resolution is the unanimous report of the committee; I never heard it questioned as being the unanimous report. The reason why the investigation has not already been made is that we have not had time to make it. There has been a loud call from these homes for an investigation, and the committee thought that investigation could best be made during the vacation. That matter was talked over, agreed to, and it was partially understood how the investigation should be made. There seems to be no disagreement about it whatever. I think the investigation should be made; this report shows that it should be made, and I cannot see any good reason why gentlemen should oppose it.

Mr. FRYE. The trouble which I see is this, and it arises from the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] His suggestion was that under the agreement of Monday last this committee had the right to report this resolution. Now if this committee has the right to report such a resolution as this, then all the investigating committees of this House, the whole thirty of them, if there be that many, have the right to report just such a resolution as this, and to have that resolution submitted to the House, and then the majority of the House can afterwards force it through, and thus provide that the whole mud-throwing machinery shall commence its work immediately after the adjournment and be carried on up to the next session of Congress. Now the gentleman from Pennsylvania certainly cannot expect the republican side of this House ever to consent to any such rule as that.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know what the gentleman means by a mud-machine. I have endeavored to keep myself above mud-machines. I have not acted in any connection with mud-machines.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman has been engaged in better work than investigating.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to say this: The House cannot restrict the character of the reports to be made from committees. The resolution which was adopted on Monday last by agreement does not in itself, either in language or in spirit, restrict the character of the reports or the resolution to accompany the reports.

Mr. TERRY. I call the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make this suggestion: The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will see at once that if, under the agreement made the other day, there is no restriction upon the nature of the resolution to be reported by a committee, then this very committee might prepare a resolution and submit it to the House that all other reports by investigating committees might be made at any time without any notice.

Mr. RANDALL. No, not unless the resolution emanated from each particular committee, for it would not be germane otherwise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say for myself—I do not know about the others—that there were two purposes which I had in view in the agreement of last Monday. The first was to have an arrangement by which all these reports of investigating committees could be made before this session closed, with a fair exhibit by the majority and the minority of each committee The second was that the reports should come in and the matter be ended with this session. It was the universal feeling, so far as I know, that it was not quite fair, certainly not exactly manly, that we should have a series of partisan investigations going on in vacation during a heated political canvass. That, I think, was the main idea in the minds of everybody here, so far as I know, as to the object gained by the agreement.

Now if that is overcome by this resolution it may be overcome in every other case by a majority vote, although it was within our power, by a single objection, to prevent any arrangement. We consented to the arrangement for the sake of the public business, and if advantage should now be taken of it, I am sure we would be justified in using all parliamentary expedients to prevent it.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think there is any occasion whatever for this scare in regard to this proposition. I do not know that any other committee desires to ask for a similar privilege. In this case allegations have been made as to the manner in which the disabled volunteer soldiers of the war have been imposed upon in these homes. I think it is far from being a partisan investigation at all. I think it is desirable in a non-partisan view to visit these homes by subcommittees and ascertain whether these allegations as made by the soldiers against the managers of the homes are correct or not.

Mr. HALE. Now if the gentleman will——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must decline to hear further suggestions, and will direct the resolution passed on last Monday to be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the investigation committees may have leave to report during the remainder of this session at any time after forty-eight hours' notice from the time the committee have agreed to the report and submitted the same to the minority, who shall have leave at the same time to submit their views to the House; and if the minority is absent from the meeting, said notice of the same shall be given in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is very evident from the reading of this resolution that there is nothing in it which restricts in any manner the character of the report that is to be made. The Chair has carefully examined the record of the discussion upon that question, and there is an entire omission of any reference whatever as to the character of the reports. The simple provision is that upon certain notice reports may be made. As, however, there seems to be this omission, the Chair, as he stated a moment ago, regards it as only fair that the matter should be submitted to the House. Is it the opinion of the House that the report——

Mr. CONGER. Before that question is submitted I wish to say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Michigan will be kind enough to allow the Chair to conclude he will then be recognized; not till then: The Chair will state the question which he submits to the House: Is it the opinion of the House that the report of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TERRY,] which has been read, is now in order under the resolution just reported? The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the leading idea of the resolution just read——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not care to hear any further discussion on that point. The Chair has decided the point.

Mr. CONGER. Then the Chair does not wish to hear me?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not, upon that point.

Mr. CONGER. I state to the Chair that I have a point to make.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will be kind enough to state what it is.

Mr. CONGER. I was doing so—not in the elegant language of the Speaker, but in my own.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hopes the gentleman will get at his point at once.

Mr. CONGER. I hope I shall not be interrupted again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That the Chair cannot promise.

Mr. CONGER. I was about to make this point: that the principal object of the resolution read a few moments ago was to compel the investigating committees to close their investigations and make their reports before the adjournment of Congress. That was the leading idea. Now, if instead of doing that, these investigating committees, by means of a report, only open the door for further investigations, they violate the entire spirit and object of the resolution. I ask the ruling of the Chair upon that construction of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has decided that point. There is nothing in the resolution that indicates at all what shall be the character of reports to be made. The Chair can only rule upon the resolution as he has ruled already.

Mr. CONGER. I hope then that this side of the House will do what they can to regain what they have lost.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that we shall not come to a collision on this mattter. I suggest that this clause of the resolution be left out.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman reporting this resolution will omit the clause in reference to the committee sitting during the recess there will be no objection.

Mr. TERRY. As to the difficulty of getting members to serve on a subcommittee during the recess, that is a question with the gentlemen themselves. If there are members of this House who can give their time between now and next December to this investigation, I do not see why the House should object.

Mr. BANNING. Let me say a word on this point, for I think there should be no misunderstanding. At the time of the adoption of the resolution under which we are now offering this report, the report had been agreed to together with the resolution which we now bring in. As to the remark of my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] about this committee "throwing mud," I do not think we have done much of that. Every report that we have made has been unanimous, signed by all the members of your side as well as ours. That is the case with this report.

This is an investigation which we thought ought to be made. The men in these asylums are asking that it shall be made; and the members of the committee thought they could best make the investigation during the vacation. There is no partisanship in it. There is no disposition to use this investigation to make any political capital at all. Nobody ever thought of that—at least, I never did—until it was spoken of here this morning. At the time your side of the House agreed to this resolution they knew perfectly well that this report had been agreed to in the committee; so they must have fully understood what would be its effect. The effect, as has been stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TERRY,] will only be to allow this investigation to be made; and I do not think that my friend from Maine, who characterizes this as a "mud-machine," will find that we are throwing any mud which we ought not to throw.

Mr. FRYE. Will my friend allow me a moment?

Mr. BANNING. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. In the remark which the gentleman has just quoted I had no reference to this committee, but to opening the door to other committees which may do that. I have faith in this committee, and personally I have not the slighest objection to their conducting this investigation during the recess. My objection is only to opening the door to other committees.

Mr. BANNING. I am obliged to the gentleman. I believe this committee has so conducted itself as not to deserve to be so characterized. Its reports, as I have said, have always been unanimous. But, Mr. Speaker, this investigation ought not to be stopped now. If, as my colleague says, we should put it off until next winter, the session will be a short one, and this investigation will never be made. It is one that ought to be made.

Mr. McCRARY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. BANNING. Certainly.

Mr. McCRARY. The gentleman from Ohio and every other gentleman will remember that the resolution with regard to the presentation of reports of committees of investigations was adopted by the unanimous consent of all the members of this House. The gentleman will also recollect that every member on this side has continually protested against making any arrangement by which investigating committees should sit during the recess. Now, it must be perfectly apparent if the resolution which has been adopted is to be construed as giving the right to all these committees on bringing in a report of this kind to continue their sittings and their investigations through the coming recess, then every gentleman on this side of the House has been imposed upon and deceived by that resolution. We had no such thought; no gentleman here had any such expectation, and I think no gentleman on the other side of the House had any idea at the time the arrangement was made such a construction could be put upon it. I agree with the Chair; there seems to be nothing in the resolution itself——

Mr. GARFIELD. Technically.

Mr. McCRARY. Yes; nothing in the resolution itself technically which restricts or limits the character of the report; but I submit to gentlemen on the other side of the House that in good faith, in fairness, they ought to concede when we unanimously consented to this resolution we did not intend to agree it should be so construed or could be so construed as to continue all these investigations during the coming recess, against which we have all protested whenever the question has been presented.

Now, sir, so far as this particular matter is concerned, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] will ask unanimous consent that this particular committee shall be allowed to sit during the recess, I do not know that any gentleman here will object. But when my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] puts it on the ground and claims it as a right under the resolution which we have all consented to, then I stand here to protest against it and to say we have never consented to it, and that we would have protested against it and resisted it if we could have dreamed for a moment that under the rules of the House such a construction could be claimed under it.

Mr. BANNING. In answer to that I ought to say that I cannot see in all the gentleman has said any reason why we should not adopt this resolution under the agreement of the House, because, as I said before, the condition of this investigation was fully known to the other side of the House when the resolution itself was adopted.

Mr. McCRARY. Then let the gentleman from Ohio ask unanimous consent for this particular committee to sit during the recess.

Mr. BANNING. It had been agreed to, fully agreed to, before the resolution was adopted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have said before, if we do not investigate this during the vacation we cannot investigate it at all during this Congress. There are four of these asylums, one in Maine, one in Virginia, one in Ohio, and one in Wisconsin. During the short session which is to come next winter it will be impossible to make the investigation.

Mr. HALE. Let me say right here——

Mr. BANNING. In one minute. I do not think my friend will undertake to cut off this investigation now, especially when the Committee on Military Affairs have unanimously agreed to it.

Mr. HALE. Let me say that the objection which has been raised here has nothing whatever to do with the subject-matter which this committee specifically reports at this time. It only happens that what this side of the House believes is a wrong, which is being forced upon us, comes up in this form. If any other committee, no matter which it might have been, had come in and claimed under the resolution it was authorized to sit during the recess, after Congress had adjourned, we should have made the same opposition to it. It comes up in this manner, and I beg gentlemen to bear in mind, and I call attention to the fact, that it has nothing whatever to do with the subject-matter of this investigation. We do not object to this particular inquiry. If these things ought to be looked into, we say God-speed to it.

Mr. BANNING. Then let us do it.

Mr. HALE. There has been a long time in which the investigation might have been made. I think we ought to insist on our objection to allowing committees to sit during the recess.

Mr. TERRY. I desire to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Maine. I asked unanimous consent the other day, before the resolution of Monday was passed, and he then objected to it. What avails the asking of unanimous consent now?

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman is sincere, and I have no doubt he is, why need he seek to resort to the threat he makes of filibustering against this resolution? Why not reserve the execution of the threat until we do introduce from this side of the House some proposition allowing to sit during the recess committees which are objectionable to them? They say in reference to this investigation they agree to it. There are other committees which might want, perhaps, to sit during the recess.

I recollect the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] himself, at the corresponding session of the previous Congress, came into the House and asked unanimous consent that the Appropriation Committee might sit during the recess, and there was no objection to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope, on the same terms as then, the Committee on Appropriations will be allowed to come here in November and prepare the appropriation bills.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Appropriations had permission in the preceding Congress to sit during the recess without objection. Whatever is unobjectionable to gentlemen on the other side of the House, and this investigation is unobjectionable to them, let it be agreed to, and let them make their objection when anything comes up which is offensive to them. Do not strike down this resolution which proposes to correct alleged abuses in the asylums for disabled volunteer soldiers.

Mr. McCRARY. Why does the gentleman from Pennsylvania object to asking unanimous consent? Why does he claim it as the right of the committee under the resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. Because the resolution, I claim and maintain, never did restrict the character of a report and never was intended to do so.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am inclined to think that if unanimous consent were asked this side of the House would grant it. By so doing we would not commit ourselves to anything else. But if this is asked as a matter of right we will resist it to the last, because it is contrary to our understanding of the agreement.

Mr. RANDALL. Then you can take the responsibility of your action.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will limit the sittings of the committee to four weeks prior to the beginning of the next session, I think there will be no objection.

Mr. BANNING. We did ask unanimous consent the other day, and the gentleman from Maine objected.

Mr. HALE. I certainly did, because it involved the general principle and we had no explanation of what was covered by the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to say that this discussion is proceeding only by unanimous consent. It has been allowed by the Chair with a view to some conclusion being arrived at; but from the direction the discussion has taken there seems to be no hope of that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think I can make a proposition which the other side of the House will accept: That we authorize the committee to meet and make an investigation at any time within four weeks prior to the meeting of Congress at its next session.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. RANDALL. That is letting the cat out of the bag.

Mr. GARFIELD. What I have suggested answers the objection which my friends on the other side have raised to the postponement of this investigation until next session, that sufficient time will not be allowed.

Mr. RANDALL. That shows the cat under the meal.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not hesitate to say flatly and squarely that it is dishonorable and unmanly to continue these investigations during the recess.

Mr. RANDALL. When you say it is a dishonorable investigation you state what is incorrect.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not say it was a dishonorable investigation. What I say is that it is partisan, unmanly, and dishonorable to continue these investigations during the recess.

Mr. RANDALL. And you are untruthful in making that statement.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think there is a way by which we can get out of this difficulty. I desire to make a proposition by which I think we can settle it easily. We have been here eight months, and during a great part of that time I sat on one of these investigating committees; and after seeing the efforts that are made—not by members of the committees, but by the slanderous creatures that come around an investigating committee and prompt and suggest the way by which innocent men's names shall figure to their discredit and distress, as is well described by the poet:

'Twas slander filled her mouth with lying words,
Slander, the foulest whelp of sin. The man
In whom this spirit entered was undone.
His tongue was set on fire of hell, his heart
Was black as death, his legs were faint with haste
To propagate the lie his soul had framed.
His pillow was the peace of families
Destroyed, the sigh of innocence reproached,
Broken friendships, and the strife of brotherhoods.
Yet did he spare his sleep, and hear the clock
Number the midnight watches, on his bed,
Devising mischief more; and early rose,
And made most hellish meals of good men's names.

I say that rather than concede that we shall desert our posts, adjourn this Congress, and go home, and let committees go on and use as they see fit the names of innocent men—rather than do that, I will agree to sit right here in session. If it is necessary for the country to have more light on some subjects that we are investigating, let us go on and investigate them; and sit here at our posts until December, not adjourning at all. If that is agreed to, I will never raise my voice in a word of complaint, but will stay here and help to do the public business.

But, gentlemen on the other side, you know you are taking advantage of us. Those of you with whom I have conversed, and notably the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] who offered the resolution, knows very well that it was agreed to merely for the purpose of letting you bring in what you had found and nothing more. And I say to my colleagues here in the minority that, rather than permit this thing to be done, we will resort to all the means which the rules permit the minority to use to prevent it, if we stay here until December.

Mr. BANNING. Then when these soldiers want investigation you will not give it to them.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Go on with the investigation now; but let us stay in session if all the investigating committees are to sit, so that the power that arraigns a cititzen may be ready to hear when injustice is done him.

Many members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that he can only construe the rules as they read. He is not a party to the understanding in one way or the other. There seems to have been some misapprehension or some omission of reference to a particular case of this kind; but nothing whatever in the resolution, in the judgment of the Chair, can possibly exclude this report. Nevertheless he will leave that to the judgment of the House. Is it the opinion of the House that, under the order which has been read, the report which has been made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TERRY] from the Committee on Military Affairs is now in order?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 88, noes 74.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. YEATES. I ask that the resolution of the Committee on Military Affairs may be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will gentlemen upon the other side of the House allow this report to come in by unanimous consent waiving the question of its admissibility under the rule adopted on Monday last?

Mr. HURLBUT. If the gentleman will allow me to ask that consent, I have no doubt it will be granted on this side of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think that can be done by unanimous consent, and we can thus save a good deal of trouble.

Mr. RANDALL. So far as I am informed there is no other committee that asks from the House the same privilege, and if there is a fight to be made upon this question it had better be made upon some report on which the two branches of the committee are divided.

Mr. HURLBUT. I ask unanimous consent that the report be received and adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER. I trust unanimous consent will be given.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is it the will of the House that further proceedings in this matter be dispensed with? The Chair hears no objection, and the yeas and nays will not be called. The report of the committee will now be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred, on March 9, 1876, the following resolution, to wit:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire into the management and control of the Soldiers' Home and the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and report in writing thereon: also, what reform in such management should be made for the comfort and welfare of said soldiers"— beg leave to report:

That the committee have had the same under consideration, but by reason of the pressure of business upon their hands they have not been able to give the subject that attention which they feel it merits. From the letters that the committee have received from inmates of the homes, grave charges of extravagance in expenditures are made, and in many instances that hardships and cruelties are practiced by the local authorities upon the inmates of the homes. But your committee have not had time to summon and examine the officers, and have found it impracticable during the present session to make a satisfactory inquiry into these matters; nor do they believe such examination practicable except through subcommittees, who shall be authorized to visit the several homes, and, by personal examination as well as by other evidence, fully investigate their management. Your committee therefore ask that authority be conferred upon them to continue their investigations during vacation; that they be authorized to send subcommittees to the several homes and inquire into and report upon their management and control, and what reformation in the same is practicable, and report upon the same. The committee therefore ask the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, authorized to continue their investigations into the management and control of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers during the vacation of Congress, and to ascertain what reforms in the same are necessary, and that said committee be authorized to make such investigations through subcommittees, who may visit said homes; and that such subcommittees be authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and do all such other acts as may be necessary for a full and complete inquiry into the management and control of said homes, and make due report of the same."

Mr. BANKS. Was unanimous consent asked of the House that this report should be received?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been given.

Mr. McCRARY. I hope the Chair will state the conditions on which it has been given, so that there may be no mistake as to it hereafter.

Mr. BANKS. Was unanimous consent given that the committee should have the privilege of reporting this resolution?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was; and that upon applications made both upon the right and left of the Chair. The Chair then put the question if there was objection, and no objection was made by the House; and the report therefore comes in by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Without waiving the respective rights on either side of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No rights whatever are waived; the House simply by unanimous consent received the report and waived the previous proceedings.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that there was no other investigating committee that wished this privilege.

Mr. McCRARY. I wish it to be distinctly understood that no construction of the rule has been given and that no right has been waived.

Mr. SPRINGER. No right has been waived by either side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No right has been waived by either side.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, intimated, as I have no doubt he did in good faith, that there was no other investigating committee that would ask this privilege.

Mr. RANDALL. I said what was true so far as my knowledge goes; I am not apprised that any other committee wish the privilege of sitting during the recess.

Mr. TERRY. I suppose any application of that kind must stand upon its own merits?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. There is no waiving of any right.

Mr. RANDALL. And whenever any other committee comes in and asks this privilege it will be for the House to determine whether they will grant that privilege, and if gentlemen opposite choose they can resort to the parliamentary mode of filibustering to defeat it.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to state distinctly to the House that no other committee would ask this privilege?

Mr. COX. I object to further debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must insist that any further discussion of this matter is out of order. What the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said has been recorded as well as what other gentlemen have said.

Mr. RANDALL. What I have said is on record.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the report, and it was agreed to.

Mr. TERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order of business.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Private Secretary, who also informed the House that the President had approved bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 3963) to amend subsections 246 and 251 of section 12 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes," approved June 23, 1874, and for other purposes, and section 3954 of the Revised Statutes; and

An act (H. R. No. 3625) providing for the sale of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas to actual settlers.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 408) for the relief of Thomas F. Azpell, of the United States Army; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

THE VENEZUELAN MIXED COMMISSION.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a privileged report. I submit a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs relative to the Venezuelan mixed claims commission.

Mr. PAGE. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. SPRINGER. The recommendation of the committee to the effect that the joint resolution which accompanies the report shall be passed is the unanimous report of the committee, but all the conclusions and arguments of the committee are not agreed to by all the committee. I will state, however, that the dissenting opinion of the minority of the committee is attached to the report of the majority. I desire that the report shall be either read to the House or printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. Have the minority submitted their views?

Mr. SPRINGER. They are appended to the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless there be objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. I object to its being printed in the RECORD unless it is read in the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then let it be read.

Mr. BANKS. It is a question for the House to determine whether it shall be read or not.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Does the report present any resolution for action?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that it does.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the resolution accompanying the report be read, so that we may understand what we are called to vote upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the joint resolution recommended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution in reference to the payment of awards of the Venezuelan mixed commission.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the President of the United States is hereby requested to withhold further demands upon the Government of Venezuela on account of the awards of the mixed commission under the convention of April 25, 1866, until the 4th of March, 1877; and the Secretary of State is authorized and directed to suspend all further payments to holders of certicates awarded by said mixed commission until said time, unless Congress shall otherwise direct.

Mr. SPRINGER. It will take about forty-five minutes to read this report. If the House will allow it to be printed in the RECORD without being read, I will make a brief explanation which will enable gentlemen to act intelligently upon the joint resolution.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman propose to have the joint resolution acted upon to-day?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do.

Mr. KASSON. Then what useful purpose will be accomplished, so far as the members of this House are concerned, by having this report printed in the RECORD? No one will be able to see it before to morrow.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want the reasons of the committee to go with the joint resolution and the action of the House upon it.

Mr. KASSON. This report has already been ordered to be printed as a document. The gentleman knows that we have often objected to encumbering the RECORD unnecessarily by the printing of documents. There can be no reason for printing this report in the RECORD, if we are to act on this joint resolution now.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will ask if there is objection to having this report printed in the RECORD without being read?

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I will ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] having the floor, is entitled to have the report read

Mr. KASSON. As a portion of his remarks, to come out of his time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly; it will come out of his time.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4087) to continue the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, of the following titles:

A joint resolution (S. No. 24) providing for the postponement of the publication of the Army Regulations.

THE VENEZUELAN MIXED COMMISSION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in relation to the Venezuelan mixed commission, and the Clerk began the reading of the report.

At the expiration of one hour, the reading of the report not having been concluded,

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair,) said: The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has expired.

Mr. MONROE. As it is desirable that the reading of this report shall be completed at this time, I will now claim the floor and yield sufficient of my time to enable the Clerk to conclude the reading of the report.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report, which was as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, with accompanying correspondence, relating to the Venezuelan mixed commission, and also sundry memorials on that subject, having had the same under consideration, have directed me to submit the following report:

Previous to the year 1866 claims of American citizens against the Republic of Venezuela had been filed in the American legation at Caracas with the view of having them presented to the Venezuelan government for payment. Owing to the disturbed condition of that government and its financial embarrassments, these claims had been disregarded. With the view of having all claims of American citizens against that republic adjudicated, a treaty was entered into between Venezuela and the United States, April 25, 1866, which treaty is set forth at length in the report of the evidence herewith transmitted. By the terms of this treaty all claims on the part of American citizens upon the government of Venezuela were to be submitted for examination and decision to a mixed commission, consisting of two persons, one of whom was to be appointed by the Government of the United States and the other by Venezuela. The commissioners were authorized to appoint an umpire, and in case of their disagreement the selection was to be made by the diplomatic representative either of Switzerland or of Russia in Washington. It was further provided that as soon as the umpire was appointed the commissioners were to proceed without delay to examine the claims which may have been presented to them, and were required to hear one person in behalf of each government on each separate claim. In case of agreement by the commissioners they were to issue certificates of their award; but in case the commissioners could not agree, the points of difference were to be referred to the umpire, before whom each of the commissioners was to be heard and whose decision was to be final. It was further provided that the commission should terminate its labors in twelve months from the date of its organization, except that thirty days' extension might be given to issue certificates, if necessary, on the decision of the umpire in the cases referred to him.

The last and fifth article of the treaty provided that "the decisions of this commission and those (in case there may be any) of the umpire shall be final and conclusive as to all pending claims at the date of their installation. Claims which shall not be presented within the twelve months herein prescribed will be disregarded by both governments and considered invalid."

In pursuance of this convention, our Government appointed David M. Talmage, of the State of New York, as commissioner on the part of the United States, and Venezuela appointed, first, Antonio Guzman-Blanco, then commander-in-chief of the Venezuelan forces, and now President of that country. Commissioner Guzman-Blanco became dissatisfied on the choice of an umpire and resigned, and Francisco Condé was named in his stead. But he resigned before proceeding far in the examination of claims, for reasons which will be hereafter stated, and finally José Gregorio Villafané was appointed commissioner, and sat throughout the commission as such. Mr. Talmage was appointed commissioner on the 20th day of July, 1867, and two days afterward sailed for Caracas, where he arrived about the 3d of August thereafter. The appointment of umpire was not finally made until the 27th of February, 1868, and his appointment was confirmed by the commission on the 18th of April, 1868, which time is to be considered as the date of the organization of the commission. This date must be borne in mind from the fact that the commission was to conclude its labors in twelve months after its organization by the terms of the treaty. But, contrary to the provisions of the treaty, the commission concluded its labors abruptly on the 5th day of August, 1868, having been in session from the time of the appointment of the umpire and its complete organization only three months and eighteen days. It is due, however, to the commission to state that it construed the date of its organization to be the time at which Commissioners Guzman-Blanco and Talmage met and exchanged powers on the 30th of August, 1867, and proceeded to the election of a secretary and to consult as to the appointment of an umpire. Even conceding this to be the date of its organization, then the final adjournment was twenty-five days before the expiration of the year during which the commission was to sit. This is important, from the fact that two claims, aggregating over half a million of dollars, were ignored, or not passed upon, on their merits, on account of the hasty departure of the American commissioner to the United States and the termination of the sittings. Secretary Seward, in a letter printed in the inclosed testimony, construed the date of the organization to be the date of the confirmation of the appointment of the umpire.

The commission having adjourned on the 5th of August, 1868, when less than four months had been devoted to the consideration of the claims for the adjudication of which it had been created, thereby violating one of the provisions of the treaty, this of itself is a strong ground for the setting aside of the awards, on account of the failure of the commission to consider, on their merits, important claims pending at the time of its adjournment. These claims were those of William H. Aspinwall, Flannigan, Bradley & Clark, and Henry Woodruff, of New York. It is also to be remarked that claimants, through their counsel, had been referred to a friend of the American commissioner, Talmage, who demanded one-half of them for the nominal service of presenting them to the commission, which proposition was refused. Considering the equal division of the claims that were allowed between outside parties, and that the claimants who refused to divide were ignored, we have a right to infer that the commission failed to pass upon these claims by reason of the fact that the claimants declined to submit to the extortion demanded by the favorites of Mr. Talmage. It is also worthy of consideration that the Aspinwall and Woodruff claims, which were ignored, have every evidence of honesty and genuineness, if not of positive merit. The Aspinwall claims were not disputed by the government of Venezuela, being the bonds of that government duly executed in pursuance of law, and the only question that could have been raised upon them was whether they were international and were properly cognizable by this tribunal. The Woodruff claims were for property confiscated by the government of Venezuela and appropriated to its own use, and were the identical claims for the adjudication of which the mixed commission was created; but upon examination it appears that the claims that were actually allowed by Commissioner Talmage and the umpire, as will hereafter be specifically pointed out, were in many cases greatly exaggerated in amounts, and in others devoid of merit and tainted with fraud.

It is somewhat remarkable that the American commissioner, whose duty it was to pass upon international claims, involving large sums of money and intricate questions of international law, as well as questions relating to the construction of contracts, statutes, and treaties, should have been a man having no legal qualifications, selected without reference to the duties devolving upon him. It appears that he, at the time of his appointment, was a coal-broker in the city of New York, and that he had been engaged in the construction of gas-works in the city of Caracas, Venezuela; that he had had litigation in Caracas, growing out of his contract there, and was about to return to that country on his private business when he became the recipient of the appointment of commissioner. His own evidence before your committee shows that he was utterly devoid of qualifications necessary to a proper discharge of his duties, and that he was ignorant of the simplest and commonest principles of law. His conduct in reference to the appointment of umpire cannot be explained except upon the theory that no person should receive this appointment except one of his own choosing. He first endeavored to have appointed Mr. Rolandus, consul of the Netherlands at Caracas. This appointment was resisted by the Venezuelan commissioner, (Blanco.) In subsequent proceedings of the commission it appears that Rolandus was interested in a large claim, amounting to nearly half a million of dollars, which it was intended should be brought before the commission for its adjudication. The claim was afterward presented to the commission by Mr. W. P. Murray and was rejected. Commissioner Guzman-Blanco, under instructions from his government, proposed to Commissioner Talmage as umpire either of the resident ministers of England, France, Spain, or Brazil, then in Caracas. This proposition was indignantly rejected by Talmage, and the appointment of Rolandus insisted upon as an ultimatum, or the reference of the question of appointment to the Russian minister at Washington.

All efforts to secure the appointment of Rolandus having failed, the commission referred the appointment to Baron Stoeckl, the Russian embassador at Washington. Mr. Talmage thereupon left Caracas for the United States, bearing the protocol for the appointment of the umpire. He arrived at New York on the 22d day of October, 1867, and at once forwarded the protocol to the State Department.

Baron Stoeckl appointed an umpire February 27, 1868. Just how this appointment was brought about, and why there was a delay of over four months in making it, is involved in much mystery. Dr. J. M. Blanco, minister for foreign affairs of Venezuela, on the 11th of June, 1875, referring to the appointment of Machado, in an official communication to Mr. Russell, American minister at Caracas, (printed evidence, page 35,) says, "The Russian minister who appointed Machado in Washington without knowing him, and the governments of that and of this republic which accepted him as such third, and as judge of last appeal, were deceived, and that which is called a sentence is only the fruit of this fraud, and the treaty also was defrauded by which both governments agreed to submit to an arbitration, and to a third, in case of disagreement, the settlement of these claims."

There has been much discussion on this subject in the diplomatic correspondence between the two governments, and your committee have not thought it necessary to pass upon it at this time. It is sufficient for this inquiry that the Venezuelan government insists that a fraud was perpetrated in this respect, while our Government has insisted that the appointment was regular and fairly made.

Thomas N. Stilwell, of Indiana, having been appointed United States minister to Venezuela, arrived in Caracas in December, 1867. There went with him William P. Murray, his brother-in-law, who was attorney for certain claimants whose claims were to be presented to the mixed commission. Mr. Murray, according to the representations of persons who were in Caracas at the time, was variously designated as attorney for claimants and secretary of the American legation.

Mr. Stilwell and Mr. Talmage, however, both deny that Mr. Murray ever acted in the latter capacity; but Mr. Muñoz y Castro states that Murray was represented to his government as such.

All claims, before being presented to the commission for its adjudication, were required to be filed in the American legation.

Mr. Murray went out ostensibly as the attorney of Beales, Nobles & Garrison, but afterward became the attorney of a number of the other claimants. His fees for his professional services in these cases were modestly fixed at one-half of the sums to be awarded by the commission, except in a few cases. This amount of percentage will be regarded as especially exorbitant when it is considered that no attorney was permitted to appear before the commission in any case; that all claims to be presented to the commission were filed, together with the proofs, in the American legation; and that all the professional services that could be required of an attorney in Caracas were the transmission of papers from the American legation to the commission, which sat in the same city, if not in the same building. The whole amount of awards in claims which Mr. Murray represented, as appears from his statement before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Forty-first Congress, was $851,000, being about two-thirds of the aggregate amount of all claims allowed by the commission and the umpire. The other claimants not represented by Mr. Murray, as appears from the list of the awards published in the evidence here, were represented by Mr. Talmage himself, so far as the services of an attorney in Caracas were required. (See power of attorney of Whiton to Talmage.)

It is charged by the government of Venezuela that Mr. Murray openly boasted that he had a monopoly of influence in the presentation of claims and their allowance by the commission; and while the statement is indignantly denied by Mr. Murray, yet the record shows that no claims were allowed by the commission except those which were represented by Mr. Murray and Mr. Talmage, as attorney or attorney in fact, except, perhaps, the small claim of Mr. Lorenzo H. Finn, for $10,000. Whether he was required to divide or not does not appear in the record.

It also appears from the evidence of Mr. Mackie, attorney for William H. Aspinwall, and Mr. Woodruff, attorney for himself and Flanagan, Bradley & Clark, that these claimants refused the exaction of one-half demanded of them, and that their claims were not allowed, although they amounted to about half a million dollars, were in no way tainted with fraud, and had every evidence of merit and genuineness.

The conduct of Minister Stilwell in the premises deserves special mention. When he was addressed by Mr. Woodruff, in a letter transmitted to the legation the claims represented by Woodruff, Mr. Stilwell advised the appointment of an attorney to represent him (Woodruff) in Caracas, while he must have known that, under the rules established by the commission, no attorney was allowed to appear before it in behalf of any claimant.

Mr. Stilwell was not confirmed as minister, and he returned to the United States some time in the month of June, 1868.

It appears from the evidence of Hon. MILTON S. ROBINSON, a member of this House from the State of Indiana, (page 115,) that Stilwell died in 1874; that at the time of his appointment as minister to Caracas he was wholly insolvent, and had no means whatever that he could have invested in the certificates awarded by said commission. But in the settlement of his estate and in winding up the affairs of the national bank in Anderson, Indiana, it appeared that Stilwell had overdrawn his account in that bank, of which he was the president, to the amount of $150,000, and that he had deposited with the bank as collateral security for his overdrafts $80,400 in the Venezuelan certificates issued to claimants by this mixed commission.

It also appears from Mr. ROBINSON's testimony that Stilwell received this large amount of certificates in consideration of the influence that he used as minister in procuring the allowance of claims before the commission, and that he received one-fifth of the amounts exacted by Mr. Murray from claimants before that commission.

The amount of claims represented by Murray and allowed to his clients was $851,000. Half of this, or Murray's proportion thereof, assuming that he received 50 per cent. on an average of the claims he represented, would be $425,500. One-fifth of this, Stillwell's interest, would be $85,100. It appears from the evidence of Mr. Orth that he received $3,000 or $4,000 in these certificates from Mr. Stilwell for his professional services, as Stilwell's attorney, in procuring favorable legislation by Congress on the subject of these awards. The amount, therefore, deposited by Mr. Stilwell in his bank, as collateral security for his overdrafts, to wit, $80,400, is easily accounted for in view of all the testimony in the case.

The conduct of Commissioner Talmage in reference to the claim of Jacob Idler deserves a special mention in this connection. It appears from the papers on file in the Department of State that the Idler claimants appointed William H. Whiton, of New York, as their attorney, and that Whiton was to retain one-third of all the amounts received by him for his services. Mr. Whiton was not a lawyer, but represented himself to the attorney of Mr. Aspinwall as possessing "peculiar facilities" for having claims allowed by that commission. Mr. Whiton did not go to Caracas, but placed the claims represented by him in the hands of Commissioner Talmage, giving him a special power of attorney to withdraw from the commission and receipt for all claims awarded to the Idler parties. The power of attorney contains the following provision in addition to that above mentioned, namely:

"Be it known, and know all men by these presents, that I, William Henry Whiton, of No. 111 Fulton street, New York, United States of America, for value received, have made, constituted, and appointed, irrevocable, and by these presents do hereby make, constitute, and appoint, the Hon. David M. Talmage, of the town of Flushing, Queens County, New York, United States of America, (United States commissioner upon said mixed commission in Venezuela,) my true and lawful attorney, irrevocable, for me and in my name and stead to ask and receive from the said mixed commission, the government of Venezuela, or the United States Government, all and every such award, certificate, or certificates as may be awarded, issued, given, or granted by said mixed commission, for or on account of said claim or indebtedness, and every and all such sums of money, securities, or commodities as may be given or granted, paid or caused to be paid, by the government of Venezuela or the Government of the United States on account of said claim, or by said award or awards, or certificate or certificates, from time to time, as the same shall become due and payable, and on receipt thereof to him, sign and deliver acquittances or other sufficient discharges for the same for me or in my name, or in the name of Sophia Idler, administratrix of the estate of Jacob Idler, deceased, to do all lawful acts and things whatsoever in and concerning the premises as fully in every respect as I myself might or could do if personally present, and the attorney or attorneys under him for the purpose aforesaid to make, and at his pleasure to revoke, hereby ratifying and confirming all whatsoever my said attorney or substitutes shall in my name or in the name of the said administratrix lawfully do by virtue of these presents."

In the statement made by Mr. Talmage, and sworn to by him, and laid before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, under date of April 25, 1870, to be found in report No. 79, second session Forty-first Congress, page 7, he uses this language:

"The attorney of the heirs of Jacob Idler (the first claim presented) appeared before the commission and offered to file the claim for consideration. To this the Venezuelan commissioner objected, and refused to allow any claim to be received or to be considered by the commission except when offered directly by the respective governments, or through the United States legation at Caracas, or to allow claimants to appear before the commission in person or by attorney."

The attorney mentioned in this statement was no other than Mr. Talmage himself, as is evident from the power of attorney of Whitton to him, and from the fact that he, as attorney, appears upon the record as withdrawing the certificates awarded to the Idler claimants amounting to the sum of $252,814, and from the further fact that there was no other person in Caracas ever authorized to act as attorney for those claimants. This claim was the largest allowed by the commission, and which, as will hereafter appear, had little or no merit in it. Considering the fact that Mr. Talmage was acting in the double capacity of judge and attorney, and the further fact that after his return to this country, as appears by the evidence of Mr. Orth, he was the owner to a large amount of the certificates awarded to this commission, his conduct is such as to taint the award in the claim with fraud, and this of itself is a sufficient reason for the setting aside of the findings of the commission and the granting of a rehearing of the claims.

But this is not all. Soon after Mr. Talmage's return to the United States after the adjournment of the commission, he continued to act as the attorney of the Idler claimants, for the purpose of procuring a recognition by the Government of the United States of the validity of the findings of the commission; and, as such attorney, he states in his own evidence that he received from them in and about his attention to their claim at Washington and to vindicate the integrity of the commission the sum of nearly $15,000. Notwithstanding he was the paid attorney of these parties, he appended to his statement before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives in April, 1870, an affidavit duly sworn to and subscribed, as follows:

"I have written the foregoing voluntarily from considerations of public policy, and now proceed to make oath as to the statements therein made, that claimants may have the benefit thereof as against the government of Venezuela seeking to set aside the awards of the commission."

This solemn statement made, as he avers, "voluntarily from considerations of public policy," while, in fact, he was acting in the capacity of a paid lobbyist, will only establish, in the estimation of all honorable men, his utter disregard of the obligations of an oath and his unfitness for the high position which he had prostituted. The admission by Mr. Talmage that he was under pay of the Idler claimants was not made at that time, and was only drawn from him on his cross-examination by your committee on the 23d of June last.

Mr. Talmage appeared before your committee on the 22d of June, 1876, and submitted a statement of his connection with the mixed commission. A telegram had been sent to him inviting him to appear before the committee, but it was never delivered to him, and his appearance at the time was voluntary, as he had not been served or officially notified to appear before your committee. While in the city of Washington, on the 22d of June, the day of his examination, he was served by a summons issued from the district court of the District of Columbia in a suit instituted against him in that court. Upon his return to New York City, Mr. Talmage appeared before a commissioner authorized to administer oaths and take acknowledgments for the District of Columbia in that city, and made oath that he was in attendance before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives of the United States as a witness under subpœna at the time he was served with a process in that case, and that he had no other or further business in the District of Columbia except as a witness in obedience to said subpœna. This affidavit, together with his plea to jurisdiction of the court, will be found in the printed evidence in this case.

This fact is stated for the purpose of showing that Mr. Talmage has no regard whatever for the solemnity of an oath. Mr. Talmage's examination was not concluded on the 22d, but continued by your committee to be resumed on the following day. Without the consent of the committee, or without having been discharged from further attendance, he left the city for New York, having that night addressed a letter to a member of the committee stating in substance that he had voluntarily appeared before the committee, and, desiring to refresh his memory in reference to the facts concerning which he was interrogated by the examination of papers in his possession in New York, he had returned to that city for that purpose, and would return to Washington as soon as possible and complete the examination. On the following day he addressed a further letter, in which he stated that on examination of papers in his possession he found that he was mistaken in one particular at least, and desired to correct his testimony given on the day previous, in so far as to say that on some of the certificates he did indirectly collect the 7 per cent. paid by the State Department, which fact he had denied at the time he was before the committee. He further stated that he hoped to be able to put the committee in possession of all the facts necessary for a clear understanding of the matter under consideration. Your committee awaited his return in vain until the 17th day of July, when a subpœna for his appearance was issued. This subpœna was returned July 25, with this indorsement by the deputy sergeant-at-arms in New York: "Have been unable to find Mr. D. M. Talmage. Is said to have gone to Washington, en route for San Francisco." But he has not reported to your committee.

These facts are stated for the purpose of showing that your committee has offered every facility to Mr. Talmage and others interested with him to appear before the committee and vindicate their conduct. In view of all the facts above set forth in reference to Commissioner Talmage, your committee are of the opinion that his conduct has been such as to bring discredit upon the Government and to subject him and all concerned with him to the unqualified disapprobation of this House, and to call for prompt action on the part of Congress, disavowing all their acts and making that prompt reparation which is required in the premises in order to vindicate the honor and integrity of our people and to maintain a just and liberal policy toward all other governments.

The government of Venezuela, as will appear from the evidence taken in this case and the diplomatic correspondence between the two governments, not only complains of the official conduct of the American minister and commissioner, but also alleges that the claims allowed by the commission, or rather by the umpire of the commission, were of themselves of such a fraudulent and groundless character as to necessitate the setting aside of the awards and a rehearing of the claims by an honest and competent tribunal. This allegation has been made so often, and with such manifest confidence in its truth, that your committee determined to carefully examine the facts referred to the umpire and allowed by him. All the papers that were before the commission are on file in the State Department, and a careful examination of them has been made, with the following result:

CLAIM OF W. E. MILLER.

First. William E. Miller, claiming to be a citizen of the United States, filed a claim before the mixed commission amounting to $20,000. This claim grew out of an assault and battery upon Miller, as is alleged, by one Malansini, in the city of Caracas, in the month of April, 1864. Miller's petition, not sworn to, however, claimed $10,000 on account of the assault and battery and $10,000 on account of loss of business by having to close his store in Caracas and sacrifice his property in that city, and compelled to return to the United States out of fear of further assaults from Malansini. There is nothing in the record to show the nationality of Malansini, but it was stated in the diplomatic correspondence that he was an Italian. The claimant alleges that justice was denied him by the authorities of Venezuela in failing to arrest and punish Malansini, and hence presented his claim before the mixed commission against the government of Venezuela. Two ex parte affidavits, sworn to before Minister Stilwell, were filed in this case, and upon these ex parte affidavits Commissioner Talmage awarded to the claimant $11,500. The Venezuelan commissioner dissented, and the umpire approved the award. There is no proof in the case that Miller was an American citizen or that he was not in fault in provoking the assault and battery by Malansini, or that he sustained any specific damages to his property. No invoice was made showing the value of his property, how much he sacrificed, or what kind of property it was. The allegation is simply that Miller was in dread of his life, and that he could get no satisfaction or protection from the authorities; that he sacrificed his goods, broke up his business, and left the republic; that his losses were very great in the sale of the goods. No affidavit even was filed by Miller, but the claim is presented by his attorney, and sworn to by him and a woman in the city of Caracas. The attorney swore that he met Miller in the city of New York a year after the outrage, when he complained of bruises and injuries received at the hands of Malansini, and declared that he had never recovered from those injuries. Upon such hearsay and ex parte evidence the claim was allowed. The amount awarded was not large, yet the utter insufficiency of the evidence in the case, and the further fact that it was a mere case of assault and battery between a citizen of one country and that of another, should have precluded its consideration. That such a claim should become a proper subject for international arbitration seems to your committee the height of absurdity.

CLAIM OF MRS. WILLET.

Second. The claim of Clementia Ramirez de Willet deserves especial mention. This claim was adjudicated by the authorities of the Venezuelan government in 1863, with the full assent of the claimants, and the whole amount of damages sustained by Willet was fixed at $6,698.66. Of this amount, $1,231 were paid at the time, and a warrant on the treasury was issued for the balance. This treasury warrant, remaining outstanding and unpaid at the time of the organization of the mixed commission, and Mrs. Willet, the widow of the deceased claimant, having applied to Minister Stilwell for his good offices in her behalf, his brother-in-law, Murray, appears on the scene as attorney for the claimant. After taking a power of attorney from her, in which two-fifths of the amount to be awarded was to inure to him, Mr. Murray prepared the petition and ex parte affidavits upon which the claim was adjudicated, and laid the case before the commission. Increasing with age, and under the skillful manipulations of counsel, the claim of $5,467.66, the amount which remained due to Mrs. Willet, assumed the magnificent proportions of an international demand for $150,791.07.

Commissioner Talmage gravely considered this important case, and held that sufficient proof was wanting as to $1,415.38 of this claim, and deducting that amount allowed to the claimant $149,375.60. The umpire, in the exercise of his judicial discretion, had further doubts as to sundry items in this bill, and hence reduced the award to $148,000, which amount he allowed. Among the items allowed in this case was one of $55,021.34 for profits that the deceased, Willet, would have made in his mercantile pursuits had not the war interrupted his business and the troops occupied his store-house for a barracks. The basis for estimating these profits was 1½ per cent. per month on the visionary capital invested in the business. Another item in the case amounting to $5,467.66, the only meritorious part of the whole claim, being the amount of the treasury warrant, was allowed to the claimant without making any deduction on this account from the aggregate losses, which embraced it also; the effect of which was that the claimant, conceding the justice of her claim, was paid this amount twice.

But this was too small a matter to arrest the attention of either Commissioner Talmage or the umpire. The items upon which this claim was allowed, the decision of Commissioner Villafané thereon, and an able exposé of the fraud by Mr. Paul, the chargé d'affaires of Venezuela, will appear in the printed evidence. Notwithstanding the fact that Murray was present in Caracas from the organization of the commission until its adjournment, he having returned to the United States with Talmage, yet it was necessary for him to give Talmage a power of attorney to withdraw the certificates from the commission. There can be but one rational explanation of this proceeding, and that is that Talmage was himself interested in the award, and that he required this authority in order that his share might be retained by him.

CLAIMS OF BEALES, NOBLES & GARRISON.

Third. The next case to which your committee would direct attention is the claim of Beales, Nobles & Garrison, on account of which there was awarded to the claimants, by Commissioner Talmage, the sum of three hundred and fifty-one thousand one hundred and fifty hard dollars. The Venezuelan commissioner dissented, and the case went to the umpire, who reduced Commissioner Talmage's decision and gave an award in the sum of $250,000. This case grew out of two contracts between Beales and Nobles on the one part and the consul of Venezuela at New York on the other part, the consul acting under the revolutionary authority of José Antonio Paez, who styled himself "the supreme chief of the republic." The contracting parties on the part of Venezuela were utterly irresponsible, and had no power whatever to bind that government. Paez was a dictator who overthrew for a few months the constitutional government of Venezuela, and during his dictatorship caused the contracts in question to be executed. His revolutionary government was overthrown on the 22d day of April, 1863, in less than a year from its pretended institution, and upon the constitutional government resuming again its legitimate functions the contracts in question were annulled, as well as all other acts of the dictatorial government. The Beales contracts were annulled within two months after their execution. They were executed in New York, by the Venezuelan consul, on the 1st and 5th days of May, 1863, which was actually eight days after the Paez government had been overthrown. Hence they were utterly void for want of authority to execute them. The Paez government was not recognized by other governments, and especially was not recognized by the Government of the United States. The first contract provided for the establishment of a line of mail steamers between New York and La Guayra, a sea-port of Venezuela, to continue for thirty years. During the first three years of this contract it was provided that $50,000 a year should be paid as a subsidy, in monthly installments, to be deducted from the 40 per cent. duty belonging to the government of Venezuela on the imports and exports shipped by these steamers. But if sufficient duties were not collected, the government of Venezuela was not obliged to pay the difference; after the expiration of three years a subsidy of $30,000 was to be paid in the same manner.

The other contract obligated the claimants to maintain "a continual stream of European emigrants and citizens of the United States, with the principal purpose of cultivating cotton." This contract was to run for ten years, and the claimants were to have large tracts of land to be bestowed upon the emigrants, and the right to claim $25 per capita from the government on each emigrant. And as a further inducement to emigration, the government of Venezuela was to give annually as many tons of guano as might be equal to the tonnage of ships carrying twenty-five or more emigrants. It will be seen that by the terms of these two contracts the amount of the subsidy, although fixed at a nominal sum in each case, depended entirely upon the amount of business transacted by the ships and the number of emigrants brought into the country. If there were no ships employed, there would have been no tariff duties, out of which the subsidy was alone to be paid. And the same rule applied to the emigration contract.

But the contracts each contained a provision as follows:

"An indispensable condition of this contract is, and it is hereby most solemnly agreed, that any doubts, differences, difficulties, or misunderstandings of any class or nature whatever that may arise from, or have any connection with, or in any manner relate to, this contract, directly or indirectly, shall be settled in a friendly manner in the city of Caracas or the port of La Guayra by a commission to be composed of two arbitrators to be chosen, one by the government of Venezuela, and who shall be one of the ministers of the supreme court of the republic, and the other to be selected by the company, [Beales & Nobles;] and if the arbitrators should not agree they shall select a third as an umpire; and if they should not agree upon an umpire, he shall be named by the minister or representative of Spain in Caracas. Should there be no representative of Spain, then he shall be appointed by the representative of Denmark, Bremen, Holland, or Belgium. And the opinion of the two arbitrators, or the decision of the umpire, should there be one, shall be considered as a judgment issued by authority after due trial, and shall have no appeal whatever; and therefore this contract shall never, under any pretext or reason whatever, be cause for any international claims or demands."

This provision, incorporated in both contracts, is too plain to admit of any doubt as to its meaning. Leaving out of the question altogether the merits of this case—if it can be said to have any merits at all—it is a fact which cannot be disputed by any intelligent or honest person that the mixed commission had no jurisdiction whatever to hear and pass upon this claim.

Commissioner Talmage filed a written opinion in this case, in which he passed over as a matter of the smallest significance the question of jurisdiction which was raised by the Venezuelan commissioner. The question of jurisdiction had been raised in this case at the very outset, and Commissioner Talmage said that the contracts required only "doubts, difficulties, or misunderstandings" to be arbitrated as stated therein, but the question of the annulment of the contract was a different matter. The umpire sustained this view. Talmage passed upon the claim on its merits, and, by a rule for estimating the damages for the breach of a contract, which partakes more of the ludicrous than of a judicial determination, did not hesitate to fix the amount to be recovered by the claimants at the enormous sum of $351,150. This included the items in schedules "A" and "B," to be found in the printed evidence, save a trifling reduction in the amount which Beales and Nobles claimed in their estimate of their expenses incurred in working up the contract. There was no evidence in the case whatever to show the amount of import and export duties collected at any time at the port of La Guayra, nor was there any evidence to show the number of immigrants that would probably be brought to that country. The claimants stated in their petition that they believed they could procure a certain number of immigrants annually, and upon this "belief," unsupported by evidence of any kind, Commissioner Talmage awarded $30,000 on this account—disregarding wholly the provision of the contract, which required that the subsidy should be paid only from a portion of the duties on imports and exports carried by the claimants' ships, and if such duties are insufficient to meet the amount of the subsidy the government shall not make up the deficit.

Mr. Talmage, in the absence of all proof on this subject, held that claimants were entitled to the full amount of the subsidy up to the time of the rendition of this judgment; and, in the spirit of "compromise," generously awarded the sum of $100,000 as the amount to be recovered by the claimants on account of the unexpired years during which the contract was to run. A careful comparison of Commissioner Talmage's written opinion in this case with the petition of the claimants reveals the remarkable fact that a large portion of the opinion embracing propositions of both law and fact, is copied verbatim from the claimant's petition. The two documents were evidently written by the same person.

This opinion will be found in the printed evidence, and the portions of it in brackets are identical with portions of the claimant's petition. The attorney of this claim was William P. Murray, the brother-in-law of Minister Stilwell. The amount of his fees is not stated, but his arrangements with his clients were undoubtedly of the most liberal character. His power of attorney authorizes him to "distribute portions of such sums according to any business arrangements he may have made, but strictly within the limits laid down in the instructions" which had been given from time to time. This provision is found in a supplemental power of attorney, which is dated June 22, 1868, about six weeks prior to the final adjournment of the commission. In what manner portions of this award were distributed according to Murray's "business arrangements" can only be explained by reference to the testimony of Mr. Robinson, of Indiana, wherein is indicated the manner in which the "division" was made.

CLAIM OF CAPTAIN JOHN CLARK.

Fourth. To Captain John Clark there was awarded by the umpire the sum of $102,000. This claim grew out of Captain Clark's operations in the year 1817 in the war between the Banda Oriental Republic (Paraguay) and Spain and Portugal; Captain Clark, an American citizen, being master of the ship La Fortuna, accepted a commission from the Banda Orientals, authorizing him to capture and make prizes of the vessels of both Spain and Portugal, governments with which the United States were at peace. In November, 1818, Captain Clark captured the Spanish brig Medea, and afterward captured the Portuguese ship Queen of the Seas. The cargo of the latter, invoiced at $84,000, was transferred on the high seas to the American ship Good Return, to be taken to the United States for condemnation. At that time the present republics of Venezuela, New Granada, and Ecuador were embraced in the republic of Colombia. Commodore Jolly, of the Colombian navy, captured the Medea and the Good Return, and took them into a Colombian port for condemnation, thus depriving Captain Clark of his prizes. Commodore Jolly demanded a ransom of $28,000 for the cargo of the Good Return, and in default of its payment, the cargo was sold for $26,000, and the money sent to Colombia as prize of war. Upon the dissolution of the Columbian confederacy, against which Captain Clark had preferred a claim for indemnity, the liabilities of that confederation were adjusted so as to be borne in certain proportions by New Granada, Venezuela, and Ecuador. Captain Clark renewed his claim against each of these governments, in proportion to their respective liabilities, being about one-third to each government. In pursuance of the treaty between the United States and the republic of New Granada, September 10, 1857, a mixed commission was created to adjudicate claims of American citizens against that republic. The decision of the umpire of that commission, on the claim of Captain Clark, not being agreeable to New Granada, another convention was concluded on the 10th of February, 1864, with Sir Frederick Bruce as umpire. The claim of Captain Clark was again brought before the commission for adjudication, or at least that part of it which he alleged should be paid by New Granada.

Sir Frederick Bruce held that as the vessels captured by Clark were captured as prizes under the authority of the Oriental flag, that country alone could make the claim for indemnity. The claim was therefore rejected. The moiety of Captain Clark's claim, growing out of these captures, which fell to the lot of Ecuador, was presented to that government. In November, 1862, a convention was concluded creating a mixed commission for the purpose of adjudicating the claims of American citizens against Ecuador. Mr. Frederick Hassaurek, of Ohio, was appointed commissioner on the part of the United States. In passing upon Captain Clark's claim, presented against the government of Ecuador, Mr. Hassaurek held—

"That Captain John Clark, not only in what he did, but also in the manner of doing it, had violated the laws of his country, whose intervention he invokes in order to reap the benefit of his piracy, but that he ought not to derive advantage from his own fault, for no one should better his condition through his crimes, he having made himself worthy of being punished and prosecuted as a pirate. That his government could not offer a premium to evil-doers in the violation of its laws and treaties, for then would all penal laws be without object, if their transgressions were to afford advantages to the offenders instead of punishment."

Thus, by the decisions of Sir Frederick Bruce in the New Granadian quota and that of Mr. Hassaurek in the Ecuadorial proportion, the claim of Captain Clark growing out of his captures, so far as the liability on the part of those two governments was concerned, was held to have no merit whatever. But Captain Clark's heirs came before the Venezuelan mixed commission in 1868 and presented their claim against Venezuela for the proportion which that government had assumed of the liabilities of the republic of Colombia. Commissioner Talmage and the umpire recognized the validity of Captain Clark's claim against Venezuela and awarded him the sum of $102,000. Either the decisions of Sir Frederick Bruce and Mr. Hassaurek in the cases against New Granada and Ecuador should be disregarded by our Government or else that allowed by the Venezuelan commission against that government should be set aside. The claim is precisely the same in all the cases of each government, if liable at all, being liable only for its proportion thereof.

But there is this peculiarity in Captain Clark's claim against Venezuela: The American legation had so often demanded of Venezuela its payment that in 1853 the government of Venezuela acceded to Captain Clark's demand, and allowed him the sum of $84,347, payable in four annual installments, as full indemnity for the captures made by Commodore Jolly of Captain Clark's prizes. The sum stipulated was paid with interest, although the government of Venezuela protested against the injustice of the demand. But it seems that the executor of Clark, to whom the money was paid, committed a fraud upon the heirs in his settlement with them, whereupon the attorney of Clark's heirs instituted a suit in the Venezuelan courts against the executor of the estate to recover the moneys withheld, but not succeeding in the local courts as speedily as he desired, (the proof being that the executor had been lost at sea, and had not resided in Venezuela for five years,) he withdrew the case from the Venezuelan courts, filed it before the mixed commission, where the umpire allowed him to recover the sum of $102,000. Certificates were issued by the commission to Clark's heirs for this sum of money, thus paying him again on account of the Venezuelan portion of his claim.

Your committee are unable to find in the record of Clark's case before the mixed commission one single element of justice. If the claim had not already been paid once, as it had been, the decisions by Sir Frederick Bruce and Mr. Hassaurek in in the cases against New Granada and Ecuador, which lay down the rule of law which should have governed in the adjudication of the Venezuelan claim, would have excluded Captain Clark's claim from a favorable adjudication before the Venezuelan commission. In this case a double fraud has been perpetrated. In the first place, the claim was unjust, and on that account should not have been paid. In the second place, it had been paid once, and should not have been the basis of another claim.

CLAIM OF JACOB IDLER'S HEIRS.

Fifth. The largest claim in amount which was awarded by the umpire of the Venezuelan mixed commission was that of the heirs of Jacob Idler, the amount awarded being $252,814. In this case the Idler heirs appointed, by special power of attorney, William H. Whiton, of New York, as their attorney in fact, who received one-third of the amount to be awarded for his services. Mr. Whiton appointed Mr. Talmadge his attorney to withdraw from the commission the certificates that might be issued. The power of attorney to Talmage contained the further provisions, which have already been referred to in this report, giving him full authority as attorney in the premises. In view of this fact, it is difficult to consider seriously any decision that he may have made in the case. The Idler claim grew out of supplies furnished to the old Colombian confederacy in the year 1817, during the war of that republic for independence. Idler, in his life-time, had instituted a suit in the Venezuelan courts after the dissolution of the Colombian confederacy, and there had been allowed him by one decision the sum of $70,520.11. This decision of the court of Venezuela was subsequently reversed, and pending further litigation Idler abandoned his case and left the country, without prosecuting it to a final hearing. The government of Venezuela, Idler himself, and his heirs regarded the matter as long since abandoned. After a lapse of over thirty years, the claim was revived on the assembling of the Venezuelan mixed commission at Caracas. It is worthy of remark, in this connection, that neither this claim nor that of Beales, Nobles & Garrison appeared in the schedule of claims which were pending in the American legation at the time the mixed commission was organized. They were both trumped up after the organization of the commission and owing to the peculiar constitution of that tribunal and the peculiar facilities of certain persons for having claims allowed before it, it would be an easy matter to have such claims adjudicated. Commissioner Talmage, in the case of Jacob Idler, held that the original sum of $70,520.11, which one of the tribunals of Venezuela had at one time found due to Idler, was still due and payable to his heirs, notwithstanding the decision of that court had been reversed, the cause remanded, and litigation in the courts abandoned for over a quarter of a century. But the principal sum would not satisfy Commissioner Talmage in this case, acting as he was in the double capacity of attorney and judge. He held that the claimants were not only entitled to receive the principal, but $182,294 as interest, fixing the aggregate of his award at the enormous sum of $252,814. Upon what principle of law or equity this case was decided it is not necessary to discuss; that this claim could have been the subject of international arbitration is contrary to well-established principles. Idler was a citizen of the United States, it is true, but he entered into contracts with a government in time of war, and made his contracts subject to all the uncertainties of the situation. After the war was over he proceeded to adjust the balance due him in the only way pointed out, namely, by the institution of proceedings in the local courts. These courts furnished him his only means of redress. Having chosen that forum and the courts having taken jurisdiction of his case, he was bound to prosecute his case to the final court of appeal in that country. Not having done so, it is impossible to determine whether justice was denied him or not. It will be seen that this case is set down as "No. 1" on the docket. Mr. Talmage, as attorney for the claimants, appeared before the commission, according to his own statement, and urged this case upon the immediate consideration of the Venezuelan commissioner. Commissioner Condé protested, saying that he could not decide a case of so much importance in the five days allowed for its consideration, and asked for further time. This was refused him, whereupon he resigned, and declined to have any further connection with the commission. Mr. Villafané having been appointed as his successor, the case went to the umpire, who innocently admitted that it was too complicated for him to enter into an analysis of its details. He adjudged that the amounts had been estimated correctly and approved the decision of the American commissioner. (See diplomatic correspondence of J. J. Paul, chargé d'affaires of Venezuela accredited to the United States.)

DRIGGS VS. MARINO.

But two other cases remain which were decided by the umpire, namely, the case of Seth Driggs for denial of justice, for which he was allowed by the umpire $35,000, and also the case of the same for overcharge of interest, amounting to $1,808,000. The denial of justice alleged by Mr. Driggs grew out of his failure to recover a judgment against the heirs of General Santiago Marino. The case remained in the courts for several years, and in 1859 was decided against Driggs, and he was condemned to pay the costs, which he did. Driggs appealed from this decision, and, without further prosecuting the case, abandoned it, and addressed himself to the more easy tribunal for obtaining justice under difficulties, to wit, the Venezuelan mixed commission. Here he found himself in the house of his friends. The American commissioner and the umpire having determined that he was entitled to recover against Venezuela what he had failed to recover against Marino, namely, a judgment for $35,000, the case for overcharge of interest which he was allowed is of so small an amount as not to be worthy of investigation.

CONCLUSION.

This résumé of the cases decided by the mixed commission embraces all that went before the umpire, and which rested on his decision. The total amount awarded by the two commissioners was $459,188.07. The total amount awarded by the umpire was $794,122, the total awards aggregating $1,253,300.07. On a careful examination of each and every one of the cases decided by the umpire, your committee have failed to discover a single award which is justified by the law or the evidence. Not one of these awards which were adjudged to be paid out of the impoverished resources of that republic, amounting to nearly $800,000, is of such a character, when the merits of each case is fairly considered and understood, as entitles it to any consideration whatever. Now that the fraudulent character of these claims is exposed, our Government cannot, consistently with national honor and that fair dealing which should always characterize the conduct of stronger governments toward weaker ones, insist further upon their payment. But in view of the fact that these awards were made by a commission in pursuance of a treaty between the two governments, it may be asked whether the findings of the commission can be set aside and a rehearing of the cases allowed without prejudice to claimants or to either of the respective governments. Upon this point the law of nations is well settled. Vattel (page 277) says: "The faith of treaties should be religiously observed. If, however, the arbitrators, by pronouncing sentence, evidently unjust and unreasonable, should forfeit the character with which they were invested, their judgment should deserve no attention."

This rule is clearly applicable to the question under consideration. It is also consistent with international honor and every principle of justice and equity. What could be more "unjust and unreasonable" than the decisions of the umpire in the cases above referred to? The judgment in them should "deserve no attention."

CONGRESSIONAL ACTION.

Since the adjournment of the mixed commission and the report of its proceedings to the respective governments, the government of Venezuela has continued to protest against the awards made by the umpire, and through its diplomatic representatives has earnestly implored this Government to set aside such awards and permit a rehearing of those cases. Upon the mere suggestion to our Government that one or more of our officials connected with an international arbitration should have been actuated by corrupt motives, to the injury, if not to the robbery, of the treasury of another government, it would seem that the most prompt and efficient measures would have been instituted in order to a thorough investigation of the matter. Our State Department has referred the diplomatic correspondence between the two governments to Congress, from time to time, beginning with the Fortieth Congress and continuing to the present time. This diplomatic correspondence always bearing the same complaint, and alleging corruption and bribery against the American minister and the commissioner, and charging and endeavoring to demonstrate the fraudulent and groundless character of the claims awarded by the umpire, having been referred to the respective committees of the Senate and of the House on Foreign Affairs, there was a partial investigation of these complaints on the part of Venezuela before the Committees on Foreign Affairs of the Forty-first Congress. At the second session of that Congress Mr. Talmage appeared before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, on the 14th of April, 1870, on "behalf of the United States Government," as appears from the records of the committee, and made a brief statement in relation to his connection with the Venezuelan mixed commission.

The subject was investigated by the committees of the two Houses on foreign affairs, and on the 1st of June, 1870, a joint resolution was reported to the House, which, after reciting in the preamble the organization and adjudications of the commission, provides as follows:

"That the adjudication of claims by said commission, pursuant to the terms of said convention, is hereby recognized as final and conclusive, and to be held as valid and subsisting against the republic of Venezuela; and for the purpose of enforcing the collection and payments of the sums of money so awarded the President is hereby authorized and directed to make demand upon the republic of Venezuela for immediate payment; and in case of neglect or refusal to make such payment, that he employ such portion of the naval and military forces as may be necessary in his judgment to secure the faithful performance of the terms of said convention."

This joint resolution was not pressed to a passage at that session of Congress. Nothing seems to have been done in the matter other than this by the Forty-first Congress. At the Forty-second Congress, however, during the second session, the matter was again referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Mr. Packard, of Indiana, a member of that committee, had the matter under consideration, and made a careful examination of the complaint of Venezuela against the character of the commission and their awards.

On the 7th of March, 1872, he submitted a report on the subject, in which he says:

"Your committee have examined this testimony, and cannot avoid the conclusion that it shows reasonable ground for complaint on the part of the government of Venezuela and the claimants whose cases were adjudicated before the tribunal. These complaints are of the following tenor: That powers of attorney were given in some of the cases to the American commissioner, and he received pecuniary compensation for executing the same; that an improper intimacy existed between the American commissioner, the umpire, and Mr. William P. Murray, who was the attorney of sundry claimants, and was also represented as being the secretary of legation, all the claims having to pass through his hands; and that the said William P. Murray received from the tribunal of arbitration certificates to the amount, in most cases, of one-half the sum allowed to the claimants. This last ground of complaint is common to the Venezuelan government and to the claimants, who earnestly request the passage of a joint resolution to authorize the President to call in all the certificates issued by the commission, so as to defeat any payment to those whom the memorialists consider fraudulent holders."

In view of all the circumstances which the committee then carefully considered they were of the opinion that the President should be directed to suspend payment on the certificates of the award now outstanding, and that he be authorized to enter into negotiations with the government of Venezuela for a rehearing of the claims passed upon by the tribunal of arbitration, and they recommended the passage of the bill which accompanied the report. This bill (No. 1859) was read a first and second time and recommitted to the committee, from which it was never reported. It provided for carrying out the recommendations of the committee as stated in the report. At the third session of the Forty-second Congress, which assembled in December, 1872, the matter was again under consideration. On the 16th of December Mr. Packard, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported "a bill to enforce the stipulations of the convention with Venezuela, April 25, 1866, and the payment of the adjudicated claims." This bill as reported was as follows:

"SECTION 1. That the adjudication of claims by the convention with Venezuela of April 25, 1866, pursuant to the terms of said convention is hereby recognized as final and conclusive, and to be held as valid and subsisting against the republic of Venezuela; and that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem expedient to enforce the claims of citizens of the United States adjudicated by the mixed commission organized under the treaty of the 25th of April, 1866, and made payable by the republic of Venezuela to the Government of the United States, in accordance with the provisions of said treaty.

"SEC. 2. That he be authorized and directed, in like manner, to collect such claims of citizens of the United States as were acknowledged by Venezuela to be due prior to the sitting of the said mixed commission."

The latter part of the first section, beginning with the words "and that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized," &c., and the whole of the second section was stricken out by the Senate, and the bill as amended passed both Houses and was approved February 25, 1873, as follows:

"An act to enforce the stipulations of the convention with Venezuela of April 25, 1866, and the payment of adjudicated claims.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the adjudication of claims by the convention with Venezuela of April 25, 1866, pursuant to the terms of said convention, is hereby recognized as final and conclusive, and to be held as valid and subsisting against the republic of Venezuela.

"Approved February 25, 1873."

This act, as it finally passed, was wholly unnecessary, as the treaty itself provides that the awards of the commission and those of the umpire should be "final and conclusive." The force clause, which was stricken out by the Senate, was its chief feature, and was intended as a menace to Venezuela; and was, in effect, a declaration of war against that government.

This act is still in force. Having been so radically amended in the Senate, its title is much broader than the act. The passage of this act ended all congressional action up to the present time.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

The diplomatic correspondence between the United States and the government of Venezuela, since the passage of this act, is printed in the accompanying evidence. On page 35 of the printed evidence will be found a very clear and concise statement, by Dr. J. M. Blanco, minister of foreign affairs of Venezuela, to Mr. Russell, under date of June 11, 1875, in reference to the present position of Venezuela on this subject. Dr. Blanco says:

"Can it be that a just government will refuse examination of this cardinal point on the pending question? The government of Venezuela does not believe it.

"Venezuela does not repudiate the treaty; far from it; she sustains it and defends its performance. The treaty could not ask, nor either government consent, that the supposed third, in case of disagreement, should be the representative, attorney, personator, and agent of one of the arbitrators. Such abuse of confidence, which evidently appears to be the work of Talmage, with insult to the honor of both governments, plainly shows the nullity of the process and of the sentence.

"Such being the situation of this disagreeable affair, the government of Venezuela could not, without diminution of its honor and without stain to the dignity of the republic, consent to the performance of an act spurious, unlawful, and also criminal, which takes the name of judgment, and with which both governments were deceived, and by which that of the United States of North America continues to be deceived.

"For reasons so powerful and because of the inevitable duties which they impose, the government of Venezuela is not able, nor will it be able, to pay to the North American legation the sum deposited and those that will be deposited for the payment of the legitimate claims of its citizens, without insisting that the Government shall keep them in its deposit, and give a hearing to the evidently just claim which it has 'on the table,' to wit, that of the former question, whether there exists a judgment by reason of there having existed a competent tribunal, in performance of the treaty, the observance of which is all that the republic requires.

"The undersigned cannot but repeat that his government believes it impossible that the Government of the great Republic of North America will refuse to hear, examine, and discuss the most just question which till now it goes on keeping out of discussion and out of all examination.

"This would be in manifest contradiction to the universal and well-deserved conviction of the enlightenment and justice of the native country of Washington."

Mr. Blanco's dispatch to Mr. Russell is dated June 11, 1875, and on July 23 thereafter Mr. Fish addressed Mr. Russell a lengthy dispatch on this subject, in response to Mr. Blanco's appeal to this Government, (pages 36 to 46, printed evidence.)

In view of the existing act of Congress, approved February 25, 1873, recognizing these awards as final and binding on the government of Venezuela, Mr. Fish has no other course to pursue than to insist upon their payment; and hence, after instructing Mr. Russell to make a demand upon the government of Venezuela for an immediate payment on account of these certificates of award, he says, page 46:

"Should the payment be refused or be offered only in connection with conditions restraining the right of disposal of the money by the United States, you will, at the expiration of the time which you may have named, close your legation, and notify the minister of foreign affairs thereof, and will take the earliest convenient opportunity to leave the country. You will carefully deposit the archives and property of the legation with the consul-general of Denmark, who has on other occasions kindly acted as their custodian."

In pursuance of this demand, the government of Venezuela paid, under protest, about $75,000 between July, 1875, and November of that year. These payments enabled the Secretary of State to declare a dividend, in May last, of 8 per cent. on the total amount awarded to the holders of the certificates, a former dividend of 7 per per cent. having been paid in 1871.

RECOMMENDATION OF THE COMMITTEE.

Such being the condition of the two governments in reference to this mixed commission and the awards made by it, it remains for the Congress of the United States to determine whether it will longer refuse to hear and examine the complaints of Venezuela, which are so eloquently and forcibly expressed in Dr. Blanco's note to Mr. Russell, in which he says, "This would be in manifest contradiction to the universal and well-deserved conviction of the enlightenment and justice of the native country of Washington." Now that a careful inquiry has been made by your committee in reference to the conduct of our officials, and also to the fraudulent character of the claims awarded by the commission—which investigation, in the opinion of your committee, has demonstrated the truth and reasonableness of the allegations of Venezuela—a further and continued refusal on the part of our Government to respond to the appeals of that government cannot be justified on principles of international honor and comity. If Venezuela were the equal of this Government in area, population, and resources, she would have long since ceased to address our Government by appeals to our magnanimity and sense of justice, and would have terminated all diplomatic intercourse and assumed toward us the attitude which we now bear toward her. In order, therefore, to vindicate the proud position which our Government has always assumed toward other nations of the world and to preserve intact the peaceful means of national arbitrament for the settlement of all differences arising between nations, we should at once proceed to do full justice in the premises. We can afford to respond to the appeals of Venezuela in this case, and by so doing will honor ourselves and vindicate the ancient precept, that "righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people."

In view of the fact that this session of Congress will soon adjourn and that definite and final legislation on this subject cannot be effected at this session, your committee recommend the passage of the following joint resolution suspending all further payments by the Secretary of State to holders of Venezuelan certificates, and withholding further demands upon Venezuela for future payments until the 4th day of March next or until further legislation by Congress:

Joint resolution in reference to the payment of awards of the Venezuela mixed commission.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby requested to withhold further demands upon the government of Venezuela on account of the awards of the mixed commission under the convention of April 25, 1866, until the 4th of March, 1877, and the Secretary of State is authorized and directed to suspend all further payment to holders of certificates awarded by said mixed commission until said time, unless Congress shall otherwise direct."

The committee unanimously concur in recommending the passage of the foregoing joint resolution. But upon concurring with the report of the committee, the following explanations are made:

By Mr. MONROE, of Ohio:

The undersigned concurs in the conclusion reached by the committee in regard to the fraudulent character of the claims decided by the umpire and in the disapproval of the conduct of the United States commissioner, but is not prepared, with present opportunities for examination, to adopt all the incidental statements and opinions of the report.

JAMES MONROE.

By Messrs. PACKER and BANKS:

The undersigned, members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, concur in the foregoing resolution; but in view of the fact that the testimony taken by the subcommittee has not all been printed, has not yet been submitted to the committee, and is incomplete, and that the time afforded for an examination of the questions involved has been limited, they do not wish to commit themselves to all the findings, deductions, and propositions contained in the report.

J. B. PACKER.
N. P. BANKS.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 164) accompanying the above report was then read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MONROE. I have been requested to make a brief statement of the attitude which the different members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs occupy in regard to this report. I may state at the outset that all the members of the committee agree in recommending the passage of the joint resolution which has been reported to the House, and which provides for the suspension of further action on the part of the Executive of this Government in enforcing these claims upon Venezuela until next winter, until there shall be time to consider the whole question more thoroughly, and, if deemed necessary, to prepare suitable legislation in regard to the matter. Upon that point the committee are unanimous.

It so happens that I stand alone in signing a single sentence, qualifying to some extent my adoption of the report as presented to the House. I express my entire agreement with the views of the committee in regard to the fraudulent character of most of the claims known as the "umpire claims." I have no doubt myself that they were improper claims, such as should not have been pressed against the government of Venezuela. I also agree with the committee in regard to the improper course pursued by the United States commissioner and by the umpire. I express myself frankly on this point, while I do not adopt all the incidental opinions and statements of the committee because I have not had sufficient opportunity for examination to be able to say whether I would agree with the committee upon all those points or not.

Two other members of the committee, who can speak for themselves if they desire, have signed a somewhat different statement, qualifying their adhesion to the report. But the only action recommended by the committee to the House is this resolution suspending until next winter any further effort on the part of our Government to collect these claims, which every man must feel are at least of doubtful equity. It is simply a suspension of judgment in regard to the whole business until Congress shall have the opportunity for more thorough and complete investigation of the subject.

I most heartily concur in this resolution and shall feel real satisfaction in voting for it; for I had been convinced for several years before this investigation was entered upon this winter by the Committee on Foreign Affairs that most of what are known as the umpire claims were unrighteous claims, claims that should not have been pressed upon the government of Venezuela; and I have long felt that the conduct of the United States commissioner and of the umpire in that matter was reprehensible, that they did not pursue a fair and equitable course. Hence I shall take pleasure in voting for this resolution to suspend until the next session of Congress all further action on the part of our Government either in the way of enforcing the collection of the claims upon Venezuela or in the way of paying out further dividends.

As I have had questions asked of me privately upon this point, there is perhaps no impropriety in my adding that so far as I can discover there is nothing of a political character in the report. There were some things in it which might perhaps have struck this side of the House as being of that character, but they were afterward removed. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have endeavored, so far as possible, to pursue the policy of avoiding political and partisan matter in the reports they have made to the House. They have sought to confine themselves to the merits of the questions which have been submitted to them.

There are some minor points upon which members of the committee may differ. Some opinions are expressed about international law, and some incidental statements occur in the report in which I would not wish to concur till I may have further time for investigation. But the main propositions of the report, in regard to the character of the claims and the action of the commissioner and the umpire upon them, are such as I can adopt.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state what proportion in amount of the entire award the committee have found subject to a reasonable suspicion or to the charge of being fraudulent?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have the exact figures here.

Mr. MONROE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to make his inquiries, and afterward to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] or to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The total amount awarded by the two commissions, to which the government of Venezuela has taken no exception, was $459,188.07, and the total amount awarded by the umpire was $794,122; so that about one-third in amount of the claims are subject to no exception and two-thirds have been regarded as open to objection, if not entirely fraudulent.

Mr. KASSON. Then the total amount awarded is over $1,200,000?

Mr. SPRINGER. One million two hundred and fifty-three thousand dollars.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman be good enough to state also whether Venezuela has paid or offered to pay the $459,000 in regard to the justice of which no exception is made?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certificates were issued to be paid in ten annual installments, and upon those certificates the government of Venezuela has paid two installments—one of 7 per cent. and one of 8 per cent., the latter having been paid in May or June last.

Mr. KASSON. Have all the installments which have fallen due been paid?

Mr. SPRINGER. I think not. The government of Venezuela has from the beginning protested, year after year, against the validity of these findings, and has implored this Government to consent to a rehearing of these cases in order that the fraudulent claims which had been allowed might be eliminated, declaring at the same time her readiness to pay all that she ought in justice to pay.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask these questions because it is a well-known rule of the courts which is applicable to international relations as well as those between private parties that a person or a government asking equity should do equity; and according to my recollection Venezuela had not executed that part of her duty by either paying or offering to pay the claims which she acknowledged to be due. That is one difficulty I have had in regard to the adoption of this resolution.

There is another difficulty to which I beg to call attention before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] takes the floor. Arbitrations of this sort are the last peaceful resort of nations; and so far as I know we have never in the history of this country allowed a government which had consented to an arbitration to withdraw from its results prior to the execution of the duties and obligations imposed by the arbitration, and to denounce the findings of that arbitration. I fear anything that may be construed into a precedent in favor of the right of any one nation to assert new grounds of dispute after claims have been settled by this final peaceful resort.

With these two principles in mind I have examined this resolution carefully; and I should very much have preferred a resolution prohibiting the Secretary of State from paying out to the holders of certificates any sum until a time named or until the further order of Congress, and then if necessary I would request the executive branch of the Government to give to Venezuela the assurance that upon her performance of the obligations imposed by the treaty and executing the terms of the award any charges of fraudulent conduct made by her should be investigated and justice done.

I trust the House will appreciate the distinction I seek to make; for this resolution does unquestionably assume on the part of the Government of the United States a disposition to recede from the obligations of the treaty which made the award final, to recede before Venezuela has performed the obligations imposed upon her, to recede before she has even executed that part of the award which she admits to be correct. If we could adopt a resolution holding all sums paid upon all the certificates for the payment of the claims admitted to be just, and also authorizing any proper assurance to be given to Venezuela of a fair consideration of the charges of fraudulent conduct by the board, it would better harmonize with the position in which international law places the two countries and would be a far better precedent for us in the future in our diplomatic relations with foreign countries.

These are points to which I desired to call attention; and while I recognize the fact that the committee may not be able at once to frame a resolution upon those points, if they agree to them, yet I should be glad to have them give such assurance as would save this resolution from becoming a precedent by which other countries hereafter dissatisfied with an award might call upon the United States that, refusing what they themselves admit to be a just reward, they call upon the United States to excuse them from the performance of an award because they choose to charge corruption. I say charge it, because any government charging it hereafter, whether correct or not, would say upon the charge of Venezuela, we have excused her from the performance of an award by joint resolution of Congress and they therefore might appeal to it as a precedent.

This is one thing of which I am afraid. As to the proper course by Congress, I have no doubt about it, that we should not only stop the payment of every one of these fraudulent claims, as this joint resolution does, but if possible stop them without at the same time stopping payment to men whose claims are admitted to be just. There is the difficulty of the situation to which I call their attention.

Mr. MONROE. I assume the floor for a moment before I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] I do not suppose I differ widely from the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] The points which he has made are points of great interest to me, and perhaps if that gentleman and the committee had opportunity for mutual conference some third proposition, something intermediate, might be agreed upon which would be satisfactory to all. But time now presses, it is difficult to get further opportunity for consultation in committee, and I claim the floor simply for the purpose of alluding to one or two of the very interesting points which my friend from Iowa has made.

He says, and says with great truth and with great force, and it is a doctrine which it is high time that nations should remember, that the nation which asks for equity should itself be prepared to do equity. It is a grand principle. It is a principle which cannot be inculcated too often. It is a principle which nations are more apt to remember when they are asking for it than they are when equity is asked of them.

My friend from Iowa will agree with me perfectly that the noble maxim which he announces to the House is just as applicable to the United States as it is to Venezuela. It is a thing which this Congress, and which the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and which our own Executive are just as much bound to remember as Venezuela is bound to remember. The nation that asks equity must do equity. Now it so happens we are asking equity of Venezuela.

Mr. KASSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; we are asking the performance of a contract, to which consent has been given by the sanction, and highest sanction known to international law.

Mr. MONROE. I understand the gentleman perfectly well. It is admitted by Venezuela that there are $400,000, or about that amount, of these claims, which are perfectly just, which she ought to pay, which she is anxious to pay, and will pay just as soon as she can get the money. We of this country are all agreed that in asking her to pay that we are asking not only what the treaty calls for, but asking her for equity, for intrinsic righteousness—the performance of a righteous act. Now, in saying to her that she ought to grant us equity, let us show ourselves sensitive in regard to what is right, in regard to what is just on our own part. We have used some pretty severe language, first and last, in our diplomatic correspondence with Venezuela in regard to her obligations to us. In using this severe language to this weak nation, which has hardly any military force that could possibly affect us, and which has hardly any money either—in using this severe language to her in regard to what she equitably owes us, let us be careful also to do equity on the noble maxim which my friend from Iowa has laid down. I hope we shall remember it as a nation; and when I speak of equity I do not merely mean what has been agreed upon by a treaty, but I mean what is intrinsically just and right.

My friend alluded to another point which is also one of great interest. He has great respect for the principle of arbitration. So have I. It is one upon which I have thought much, and in which I feel a deep interest. Some important petitions and papers bearing on the subject the Committee on Foreign Affairs did me the honor to refer to myself as a subcommittee during the present session, and I have failed to report upon them to the committee and through the committee to the House only because I could not find a favorable occasion, or what seemed to me such, for doing it. I respect the principle of arbitration. I am anxious it should gain respect among the nations and gain favor. And I hope, even at my time of life, to live to see the day when there shall be much more regard among the great powers of the earth for the principle of arbitration than there ever has been heretofore.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that it will injure the respect for that principle if a great nation which fears that its citizens may have profited unjustly through fraud by an arbitration to which it was a party comes forward frankly and offers to suspend all claims under such arbitration in order to see that the right thing is done.

My own opinion is that there is nothing in the world that could hurt the estimation in which the principle of arbitration could be held among the nations more or worse than to enforce unjust awards of arbitration. And if there is good reason for supposing that there has been fraud at the bottom of an arbitration, I should say that it would not tend to encourage the esteem in which arbitration is held to enforce such fraud. On the other hand, I should say that the nation which felt that it had profited by the fraud might come forward to great advantage and offer to surrender any advantages which it might have secured from fraud. How can it hurt the principle of arbitration for the nation which itself believes that it may have profited unrighteously to come forward and offer to surrender the unrighteous fruits of a commission which may have been held by it and another nation?

The moral effect of such a thing on the part of the United States must be good. It is not Venezuela that is pressing a reconsideration of these claims. I think Venezuela seems to have exhibited about as much diligence as she could in trying to meet these claims upon her from the United States; but the trouble is she has not any money in her treasury, and has not known how to meet them, although I believe she has several times protested her desire to meet them. For this Congress, for this country, for this great power to come forward and offer to do right and not to take advantage of the results of an unjust arbitration against a weak and defenseless nation, why, sir, I should say that the moral effect of that upon ourselves and the whole world could be nothing but good. I venture to say that the disposition on the part of the United States not to profit by fraud, no matter how many abitrations would give us the profit, a disposition like that on the part of the United States, exhibited to the whole world would do us good, would do the civilized world good, would help the cause of arbitration, would honor God, and bless the human race.

I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. SPRINGER rose.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WADDELL. I rise to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is now considering a privileged report.

Mr. WADDELL. I desire to present a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will not press that. The pending business will be disposed of in a few minutes; I think not over ten or fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] if he rises to present a report of a conference committee.

Mr. WADDELL. I will withhold it for the present on the assurance of the gentleman from Illinois that the pending business will not occupy more than a few minutes.

VENEZUELAN MIXED COMMISSION.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am very much obliged to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE,] for what he has said in reference to the remarks made by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] The gentleman from Iowa, when he has had an opportunity to carefully examine this report and the evidence which accompanies it, will agree, I am sure, fully with the conclusions to which the committee have come. He misapprehends or does not yet understand fully, from not having had an opportunity to make an examination of the subject, the position which the government of Venezuela has taken upon this question. That position is stated in the diplomatic correspondence between the two governments, in a letter addressed to Mr. Russell, American minister in Caracas, on the 11th of June, 1875, by Dr. J. M. Blanco, the minister of foreign affairs of Venezuela. Dr. Blanco says:

> Venezuela does not repudiate the treaty; far from it; she sustains it and defends its performance. The treaty could not ask, nor either government consent, that the supposed third, in case of disagreement, should be the representative, attorney, personator, and agent of one of the arbitrators. Such abuse of confidence, which evidently appears to be the work of Talmage, with insult to the honor of both governments, plainly shows the nullity of the process and of the sentence.
> Such being the situation of this disagreeable affair, the government of Venezuela could not, without diminution of its honor and without stain to the dignity of the republic, consent to the performance of an act spurious, unlawful, and also criminal, which takes the name of judgment and with which both governments were deceived, and by which that of the United States of North America continues to be deceived.
> For reasons so powerful and because of the inevitable duties which they impose, the government of Venezuela is not able, nor will it be able, to pay to the North American legation the sum deposited and those that will be deposited for the payment of the legitimate claims of its citizens, without insisting that the Government shall keep them in its deposit, and give a hearing to the evidently just claim which it has "on the table," to wit, that of the former question, whether there exists a judgment by reason of there having existed a competent tribunal, in performance of the treaty, the observance of which is all that the republic requires.

Dr. Blanco further says in the dispatch to which I have referred:

> The undersigned cannot but repeat that his government believes it impossible that the Government of the great Republic of North America will refuse to hear, examine, and discuss the most just question which till now it goes on keeping out of discussion and out of all examination.
> This would be in manifest contradiction to the universal and well-deserved conviction of the enlightenment and justice of the native country of Washington.

In view of existing legislation Mr. Fish cannot do otherwise than insist upon the payments being made. But can we longer refuse to listen to the earnest appeal which Venezuela makes to us; an appeal which is addressed to the "enlightenment and justice of the native country of Washington?"

This appeal is made to us on behalf of a country which has only 363,000 square miles of territory and less than 2,000,000 of population; a government whose navy could not compete with one of our gunboats.

Venezuela asserts that under the treaty of 1866 which created the mixed commission the appointment of the umpire was not the appointment of Baron Stoeckl, but the appointment of the United States commissioner, made in violation of the terms of the treaty. That government further asserts that the findings of the umpire were tainted with fraud and corruption, and the authorities of Venezuela propose to prove it. They assert that the claims allowed by the umpire, amounting to two-thirds of all allowed by the commission, were fraudulent and such as no honest tribunal would have allowed.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs have carefully examined those claims and have stated this conclusion in reference to them:

> On a careful examination of each and every one of the cases decided by the umpire, your committee have failed to discover a single award which is justified by the law or the evidence. Not one of these awards which were adjudged to be paid out of the impoverished resources of that republic, amounting to nearly $800,000, is of such a character, when the merits of each case is fairly considered and understood, as entitles it to any consideration whatever.

That is the finding of your committee. Now Mr. Fish, in answer to these appeals to our Government, in view of the law on the statute-book, could only reply that he could not do otherwise than to insist on the payment of the awards; and hence he directed the American minister last June to close the American legation at Caracas and leave that country unless payment was made in accordance with the demand; and under that threat that government paid $75,000 within ninety days. Such is now the position of the two governments.

I am sorry to say that but a few years ago, during the Forty-second Congress, this nation was almost precipitated into war with that government. This House passed a bill entitled "A bill to enforce the stipulations of the convention with Venezuela, April 25, 1866, and the payment of the adjudicated claims," which bill, by its terms, required the Government to enforce the payment of these fraudulent claims against the government of Venezuela.

The President was authorized to use such measures as he might deem expedient for this purpose. The Senate amended the bill by striking out the force clause, and leaving only that portion of the bill which recognized the adjudication of the claims as final and conclusive and to be held as final and subsisting against the government of Venezuela. And that bill, so amended, passed both Houses and is the law to-day. I think, therefore, when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] understands fully the facts set forth in the report of the committee and the evidence, he will come to the conclusion that our Government can maintain its honor in no other way than by refusing to require the Venezuelan government to pay these fraudulent claims. And here in my place, with a full knowledge of the responsibility of my position, I state that after examining carefully the papers filed in the State Department (and I have examined the facts of every case decided by the umpire) I cannot find one which has any merit in it. But, on the contrary, I find that no honest tribunal with intelligence could have allowed them. And further, I will say that no honest government would enforce them.

In one case a judgment of a quarter of a million of dollars was allowed on what was unquestionably a fraudulent claim. It is impossible longer to blind our eyes and refuse to consider a question involving our national honor. By no possible manner of arbitrament can a fraud be perpetrated by one Government upon another. These claims are fraudulent, and the records in the office of the Secretary of State show them to be such. If any gentleman will take pains to examine them he will find them more groundless and fraudulent than I have stated. This being the case, the Committee on Foreign Affairs are unanimous in recommending the passage of the joint resolution suspending the payment of all claims until, at the next session of Congress, further legislation can be had. I hope, then, that mature legislation will be adopted, which will result in doing full justice to this Government and to Venezuela in the premises.

One word as to the other question as to what Venezuela has paid and is willing to pay. It appears that honest claimants have been compelled to divide one-half of their claims with the ring outside to insure their cases being brought before the commission. The proposition now is that these outstanding certificates shall be canceled for that reason and that the claimants shall receive the amount to which they are entitled without being required to divide with parties outside. That is the reason why we propose to suspend further demands upon Venezuela and to provide that the Secretary of State shall make no further payments until an honest hearing can be had.

Another reason for the proposed action is this: Vattel says that "the faith of treaties should be religiously observed." It is a matter of good faith and conscience. A treaty which provides for an arbitration for the settlement of disputed questions is, of all others, the most sacred and should be the most religiously observed. If the findings of such arbitration are tainted with fraud no just government can insist upon the observance of its decisions. Our Government has recently resorted to the peaceful means of national arbitrament for the settlement of a complicated question with England. The result of that arbitration has been most beneficial to our Government, and it has established an era of peace which may result in untold blessings to mankind. Let us not, then, sanction a proceeding at this time which is a libel upon arbitrament, and which, if finally enforced, would render such peaceful means of settling national disputes impossible so far as our Government is concerned.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman will allow me a few minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. I think the two gentlemen who have spoken before me have each failed to appreciate the point to which I desire to get the attention of the House. Especially my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] fails. He claims that before the United States shall receive the amount of these adjusted claims adjudicated to be due from Venezuela, we should entertain a demand from Venezuela for an abandonment of that award on her charges of misconduct by the arbitrators.

Venezuela is now a suitor against the United States and demands that the United States relinquish the claims which the arbitration has solemnly adjudicated in our favor. My proposition is that when the Venezuelan government comes and claims that we should abandon this solemn award and bring the investigation again directly back where it was before arbitration, and further refuses to pay to the citizens of the United States the sums that she herself admits to be due, then Venezuela is not doing the equity which justifies the United States in relinquishing the award. And I affirm further that the United States in relinquishing the award and stopping payment on the claims by the Secretary of State, as proposed by the committee of the House until further action shall be had by Congress, ought not to include also the claims of holders of certificates amounting to $459,000, and admitted by the Venezuelan government to be just claims.

Mr. SPRINGER. One of the largest of these claimants, whose award amounts to $150,000, petitions this Congress to re-open this matter for the reason that he was compelled to divide his claim and give one-half of it to a ring.

Mr. KASSON. I do not see how that affects the logic of the situation.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it abstract logic which the gentleman desires, or abstract justice?

Mr. KASSON. I do not know a human being to be connected with any of these claims. I only know what the committee reports, and that they propose to stop payment by this resolution on all claims, just or unjust.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KASSON. I ask only a few moments more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can take the floor, if he likes, in his own right.

Mr. KASSON. I shall occupy a few moments only. Let us suppose that the British government after the Geneva award should have charged one of the arbitrators in that case to be interested in a claim before it, and that claim was a large one, amounting to a million of dollars, and even that there was fraud in it, and while it admitted that there were just claims awarded amounting to $14,000,000 would not pay these millions certainly due because of the alleged fraud in the other case, ought our Government to have endured that injustice even from the powerful government of Great Britain? Would her position have been equitable? That is the principle which I am discussing here.

That is to say, I want this Government to give assurance to the government of Venezuela, and I will go with any gentleman to make that assurance as strong as they wish, that as soon as Venezuela has justly complied with the obligations imposed on her by international law and compact then the Government of the United States will consider every allegation of fraud that she makes, and will retain the money until the investigation is completed. When gentlemen say here that Venezuela is a weak government and we are in danger of war, they know that there is no danger of that character at present. If they will look at the history of our relations with the South American governments, they will find that in the case of almost every one of them with which we have had difficulties these have arisen upon this question of payment of their liabilities; because those governments are dilatory and perpetually putting off the payments upon one ground or another.

Mr. MONROE. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.

Mr. MONROE. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] unintentionally misstates the action of the Venezuelan government in this respect. In the parallel case which he presents he supposes that Great Britain will pay a portion but refuse to pay any more.

Mr. KASSON. Or refuse to pay all.

Mr. MONROE. The truth is that Venezuela has never refused to pay any portion of the claims, either just or unjust. On the other hand, she has expressed her anxiety to pay them all just as fast as she had any money to do so. The only excuse which she has made for not paying promptly has been that she had no money, and that such was the condition of her treasury and of society and trade there that she could not borrow any.

Mr. KASSON. My friend knows the habit of the Latin nations in that respect. I have read Dr. Blanco's letter here. I understand the significance of language as used by the government of Venezuela. They can always find excuses for non-payment by pleading inability to pay. But that would not excuse that government; it would not excuse our Government from performing a deliberate stipulation of a treaty without better showing of a disposition to pay.

Mr. MONROE. They have never refused anything, but simply begged the privilege of showing evidence of fraud.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] or the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to state whether or not it is true that these installments which by treaty the government of Venezuela is to pay one installment upon the whole amount, and cover the bad claims as well as the good?

Mr. SPRINGER. That is true.

Mr. KASSON. That is understood; they cover the bad as well as the good. And this joint resolution covers the good as well as the bad, which is one point of objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Allow me to say further, that in reference to the claims that the Venezuelan government regard as valid the installments that she has paid amount to nearly one-half of those claims.

Mr. KASSON. I do not understand, however, that the gentleman desires by that to be understood as saying that Venezuela has performed her obligation even touching the $459,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. If only honest claims had been allowed, then what the government of Venezuela has now paid would be, as I think, a compliance with her obligations. But I have not made any calculations upon this point, and cannot speak with certainty. The various payments are all set forth in the report and the diplomatic correspondence, and will show the state of the accounts between the two governments.

Mr. KASSON. As only 15 per cent. of the claims has been paid it is evident that that is not the half of the $459,000 that are admitted to be valid claims.

Now, to express in a condensed form what I think will be the safer precedent for the Congress of the United States to establish in regard to questions of this delicate and unusual character, I believe I may say unprecedented character, for I do not remember that ever before any government with which we had a treaty and an arbitration has refused to perform its part in the manner suggested here——

Mr. SPRINGER. There never was before an arbitration so tainted with fraud.

Mr. KASSON. I hope that is true.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is unprecedented in this country, and I think in any other.

Mr. KASSON. I hope that is true; but nevertheless the point is that this award has been made and is existing. One of the governments alleges fraud, which the other has not admitted; and yet our committee state that that allegation is true, and it may be true. The question then is, What ought to be done? Should we consent to actually nullify the whole award? That is the practical question.

Mr. HOAR. The question I wish to ask is this: I would like to understand this case myself. I never heard of it before. Is not the question exactly this: The United States and the Venezuelan Governments agreed to submit these claims to arbitration. The umpire having been bribed, then there has been no arbitration, because you had a bribed umpire. What would be the proper course in a court or between governments or anywhere else? It would be that the agreement to arbitrate would stand, and the governments are bound to proceed de novo, the entire award being set aside, nothing having happened since the agreement to arbitrate.

Mr. KASSON. Let me say that this has happened since the agreement to arbitrate: a percentage on all the claims has been paid by the Venezuelan government, which to that extent is a post-facto ratification of the arbitration.

One other point. The allegation that there is a bribed arbitrator is not admitted by the United States; and more than that, if we make such an admission it touches the delicacy of our relations with a powerful foreign government, by whom one of these arbitrators, the umpire, was appointed, with the consent of both the governments interested. Hence I would not, without the authority of the Executive of this Government, make an admission which would so affect and dishonor a foreign government.

I do not know that the evidence is complete that this umpire was bribed. Gentlemen are asking us to admit it in advance. Hence I return to my original ground, that there are two objections to this report. One is that it seems to concede that one party to an award has the right to protest against executing it because of charges of wrong-doing which it makes against the award. The other is that it puts the honest claimants in the same boat with the dishonest claimants. The resolution which I should desire to submit to the House as expressing concisely my views is this:

That the President of the United States is hereby requested to give assurance to the government of Venezuela that, upon compliance by that government with the terms of the award made pursuant to the convention between the two governments, dated April 25, 1866, this Government will be ready to make equitable arrangement with the Venezuelan government for the investigation of the charges against the validity of the award which that government has alleged to have been fraudulently made; and the Secretary of State is authorized and directed to suspend all further payments to holders of certificates alleged by the government of Venezuela to have been fraudulently awarded by the mixed commission under said convention.

This expresses concisely the views which I entertain as to the proper measure to save the honor of our Government, to save the honor of Venezuela, to insist upon the international obligation of a solemn award, to protect the honest holders of certificates, and to hold by the power of this Government the gates of the Treasury closed against dishonest claimants until the two governments have by mutual arrangement ascertained whether the charges of fraud are well founded.

Mr. BANKS obtained the floor.

Mr. HURLBUT. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. HURLBUT. Upon a question of this kind I desire to have some clear and specific understanding of the subject-matter upon which I am called to vote; and I suppose the case is the same with every other member. Now it is true that an award, a conclusion of arbitration, ought to be held binding; but it is also true that there is no award, if fraud on the part of the arbitrators is shown or acknowledged. This is a principle of law familiar to every lawyer. It has been ruled by the Supreme Court of the United States that the only ground upon which an arbitration once entered into can be set aside is that the arbitrators have exceeded their powers or were governed by fraud in making the award.

Now I understand that in this case Venezuela charges that there was such fraud as should nullify the award; for a fraudulent award is no award. Fraud goes to the bottom of all contracts, as is conceded in every court, national or international. Now this committee has reported substantially, for the information of the House, that there was such fraud; that is to say, the United States admit it. If so, it is the clear moral duty of this House and of the executive department of the Government, when authorized thereto by Congress, to re-open the transaction. If one of the parties alleges fraud and the other admits it, it is the grossest of all inequitable things to take advantage of such fraud.

If, as I have understood from the reading of the report, the practical admission made by this committee is that there is ground to believe that the allegations of Venezuela as regards the fraudulent action of the umpire, no matter how, are true, we ought to suspend further proceedings; and if the proof should hereafter become conclusive, the United States would be bound in honor and justice to open the entire transaction and not to exact from the government of Venezuela anything which is in any shape tainted with this alleged fraud.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, this is a shorter question than would seem to be implied from the reading of the report (which has disabled two or three clerks) and from the long speeches gentlemen have made. It admits of a very simple explanation, which I think will satisfy the House that the resolution reported by the committee is right.

This resolution does not profess to deal with the treaty or the award. It stops short of that. The suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] would certainly be worthy of very serious consideration if the judgment of the committee as expressed in the resolution related to the subject to which he refers; that is, to the treaty and to the award. But it does not relate to either. A treaty was made with Venezuela, and an award was rendered by a commission provided for in the treaty; that is a part of the subject before the House. But the relations between the United States and the government of Venezuela have been changed since this treaty was entered into, since the commission was appointed, and since the award was made.

In 1873 Congress passed a resolution declaring in terms that this award should be considered final; and that the President of the United States should make a demand upon Venezuela for payment. An additional proposition not accepted by the House accompanied these two; a proposition which would be necessary ultimately to fulfill or make complete those two propositions which we agreed upon. This third proposition was that a ship of war should be sent to Venezuela to take possession of the custom-houses and to recover for the United States the sum-total of this award by our own act of force or power. Now, the subject before the House is this act of 1873. The first proposition is that the award should be final; the second, that the President shall make a demand upon the government of Venezuela for the payment of this money. It is therefore no longer a question between the two governments under a treaty or any proceedings relating to a treaty. The question between the two governments arises under this act of 1873. That is where it stops.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there have been made before the committee, apparently upon respectable authority, allegations which would certainly deter this Government from enforcing its claim immediately and without further consideration. For example, it has been stated that a person not appointed umpire in this commission has been substituted for the person supposed and intended to have been appointed. It does not appear to me to have been the fact, but that is the statement; and there are numerous other statements implying, if true, that gross, inexcusable, and criminal frauds have been practiced.

Now, sir, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, whose resolution is before you, say that, in the presence of this allegation of fraud, they think the sum which has been paid by Venezuela into the Treasury of the United States should not be paid out for a limited time, say one month or two months—the time fixed, I believe, is the 4th of March; and, secondly, that the extraordinary duty imposed upon the President of the United States by the act of 1873, which does not follow necessarily from the execution of the treaty, that he should, under that order of the Congress, make an imperative demand for payment upon Venezuela, had better be waived for a little time until these facts can be considered.

I ask the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to this: that it does not give any validity whatever to this allegation of fraud, nor does it cripple in the slightest degree the rights of the Government under the treaty; but it simply suspends the operation and action of the officers of the Government under that act of 1873. And that, I think, is entirely right.

I do not know there is any wrong in this matter. The testimony has not been completely given. There are parties who must be heard, parties whose representations must be heard; as, for example, the umpire himself and the parties who were engaged in these transactions, who are within the call of Congress, and who have not yet been heard and whose testimony one way or the other must be material. The committee has not given full consideration to this matter. They have not been able to make up their minds. But they do say that it is proper the provisions of the act of 1873 should be so far suspended that the President should not be required to make imperative demand upon Venezuela, and the money paid by Venezuela into the Treasury of the United States should be withheld and not paid out, certainly for the time specified in this resolution.

Mr. CONGER. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether a simple resolution of this House will cover the case and whether on the contrary it ought not to be a joint resolution?

Mr. BANKS. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that it is a joint resolution. It was first intended to repeal the act of 1873, but the committee could not agree to that.

A word now, sir, upon the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that the Government shall insist upon the payment of this award by Venezuela before it will listen or consider any representation which may be made upon her part. One chief difficulty in this case has been the absolute inability of Venezuela to pay the award, the impossibility to get the means whereby to discharge her indebtedness to the Government at the moment when it came due. That has happened often, and governments are accustomed to wait. Venezuela is a republic like ours. She has been involved in difficulties just as we have been. She has a large, heavy, and oppressive debt as we have. These facts coming suddenly upon her have made it impossible for her to pay these claims. Then no doubt she feels deeply aggrieved by what she regards as the injustice done her by the decision of the arbitration.

So far, then, I think there is no impropriety in the proposition made by the committee, that Venezuela should have a hearing; that the President of the United States should be requested not to make this oppressive, imperative demand; that we should give her the assurance that the President shall not send a ship of war there to make the imperative demand under the act of 1873 if she does not pay; and that the Secretary of the Treasury, who is ordered expressly by the statute to pay out this money to particularly designated individuals, should be instructed by the order of the House in 1876 to suspend that payment for a little while at least.

There are two things to which I object in this report as presented to the House. In the first place this joint resolution is suspensory, practically it is suspensory of judgment, a suspension of evidence, a suspension for consideration, for time, for better opportunity for taking testimony. The report, on the contrary, reasons upon the ground that this is a concluded, absolute fact upon which this statement is based. And so far as one of the members of the committee I dissent absolutely from that part of the report. The testimony is not in. The committee has not considered it. It has not been agreed upon by the committee, nor do the conclusions which the committee report have any relation whatever to the report itself. That is the objection I make to it.

Another remark I may perhaps be justified in making, for it will not affect the judgment of the House, is as to the attitude in which we are placed on this question. The House of Representatives is treating with the government of Venezuela directly, as if the House of Representatives were an independent government, equal in station and rank with the government of Venezuela. Whatever we do in regard to Venezuela ought to be done on representations by that government to the Government of the United States. And we ought not to consider ourselves as authorized under the Constitution to treat with the government of Venezuela, to hear her counsel, to receive her officers as witnesses before us and take their judgment upon these relations, and still less ought we to blight the reputation and good name of any citizen of the United States upon such an indirect transaction as that.

Upon these two grounds I dissented from the report; but I must say I think there is good reason for the passage of the resolution and conclusion to which it advises us to come.

Mr. KASSON. I did not offer my resolution as a substitute, and do not propose to do it. My chief object was to draw the attention of the House to the various questions involved, and I am glad to have developed the dissenting views expressed in the latter remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts. They will aid in saving this case from becoming a dangerous precedent, a case of ex parte legislative investigation, practically at the suggestion of a foreign government, into the validity of adjudicated claims, and directly into the validity of the acts of an arbitration, the result of an international compact, in which the honor of three governments is involved. I shall not ask for a division upon the report of the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. If no other gentleman desires to speak upon the subject, I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire on my own responsibility to introduce the bill which I send to the desk and have it referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It follows up this subject, and I desire to introduce it that it may be acted on during next session of Congress.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. No. 4088) in relation to the Venezuelan mixed commission was introduced, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

COTTON CLAIMS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a resolution of the House calling for a list of the cotton claims was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department with accompanying statements and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. WADDELL. I rise to present a conference report.

The Clerk read the report of the committee of conference, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments to the bill (S. No. 1021) allowing the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails in their new iron steamships having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1; and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2; and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

After the last word insert: "excepting compensation for service performed by the said company for the balance of the term of the contract of the said company made in pursuance of the said act of February 17, 1865, and for which appropriation has been made."

A. M. WADDELL,
J. K. LUTTRELL,
J. A. GARFIELD,
Managers on the part of the House.

JNO. P. JONES,
H. L. DAWES,
D. M. KEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WADDELL. I call for the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to present a conference report.

Mr. EDEN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a minute that I may ask unanimous consent to take a bill from the Speaker's table for the purpose of moving to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

CLAIMS ALLOWED BY COMMISSIONERS OF CLAIMS.

Mr. EDEN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 3359) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate. There are only two or three amendments of any consequence made to the bill, and as amended it does not materially vary from the bill which passed the House. There is nothing in the bill except what has been awarded by the commissioners. I am instructed by the Committee on War Claims to ask that the Senate amendments be concurred in.

There was no objection, and the bill having been taken from the Speaker's table, the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. EDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to yield now to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FINLEY] to make a request for unanimous consent, if it leads to no discussion.

Mr. EDEN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a few moments longer while I make some reports from the Committee on War Claims to go upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well; I thought the gentleman from Illinois had got through.

THOMAS BURKE.

Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1136) for the relief of Thomas Burke, of Virginia; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

A. L. H. CRENSHAW.

Mr. EDEN also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2317) for the relief of A. L. H. Crenshaw, of Missouri; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DR. MARY E. WALKER.

Mr. EDEN also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 3528 a bill (H. H. No. 4089) for the relief of Dr. Mary E. Walker; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEON FRANK.

Mr. EDEN also, by unanimous consent, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the petition of Leon Frank, asking compensation for tobacco and cotton taken by the United States forces; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. FINLEY.]

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to make some further reports from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. RANDALL. I agreed to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CONGER. The reports which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] desires to present are from the same committee which has just reported.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to the reception of any further reports while the House is waiting for the conference report which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has risen to present.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I present the report of the committee of conference on the Indian appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 12, 16, 18, 39, 40, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 55, and 61.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 19, 20, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 56, 58, 59, 60, 62, and 63.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 3, and agree to the same, with amendments as follows: In line 24, page 2, strike out "five" and insert "six," and after the word "expenses" insert in line 27 of the same page "in excess of $100," and in line 9, page 3, of the amendments, after the word "thousand" insert "and one hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 4, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In line 11 of said amendment, page 3, strike out "six" and insert "four," and after the word "Minnesota," in line 12, same page, strike out all down to and including the word "Carolina," in line 14, and as a distinct paragraph to follow the amended paragraph, insert: "For pay of special agent of the Eastern Cherokee and other Indians in North Carolina up to September 1 next, after which the office of said agent is abolished, $250," and in line 16 strike out "nine" and insert "six," and at the end of line 3, page 6 of the bill, add the following: "and for gilling-twine for nets, $1,200;" and at the end of line 16, same page, add "and for gilling-twine for nets, $400;" at the end of line 15, page 7, add "and for gilling-twine for nets, $400;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 17, with the exception of the words after the word "Territory," in lines 22 and 23, page 20, of the bill; and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 21, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "four" and insert "two," and strike out "and nineteen," and strike out "eight hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 25, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In line 4 strike out the word "tribe" wherever it occurs, and insert in lieu thereof the word "bands," and after the word "people" in line 5, strike out all down to and including the word "Indians," in line 7, and insert "and hereafter there shall be no appropriation made for the subsistence of said Indians," and in line 20, after the word "designate," insert the following: "And the further sum of $20,000 is hereby appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the President of the United States for the purpose of carrying into effect the foregoing provisions," and make the word "amount" in line 26 plural; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 31, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-five," and after the word "dollars" in line 26, page 39 of the bill, add the following:

"And the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall direct that said Indians shall not be allowed to leave their proper reservations; and it shall be the duty of the War Department to aid the Indian Office in seeing that the orders of the Commissioner are executed; and rations shall not be issued for a longer period than one week at a time; and arms or ammunition shall not be issued, sold, or given to said Indians."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 38, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "forty" and insert "twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 41, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: At the end of said amendment add:

"Provided, That when sufficient matter to make a volume of statistics and historical data is prepared it shall be submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and referred by him to the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution and published on their written approval."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 54, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: After the word "for," in line 8 of said amendment, insert "agricultural implements and for," and in line 11 strike out "five" and insert "six," and at the end of said amendment add "and $300 of said sum shall be paid to the superintendent of common schools in North Carolina, who shall have the supervision of the schools of the Cherokees in said State under direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 57, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In line 5, page 45 of the bill, strike out all after the word "Provided" down to and including the word "but" in line 8, and insert the word "That;" and in line 10, strike out the word "and" where it first occurs, and strike out the words "and others," and in line 11, strike out the word "and" where it first occurs, and strike out "and for no other purposes," and insert "and for paying employés: And provided further, That amounts now due employés for the year ending June 30, 1876, may be paid out of the unexpended balance of the incidental fund of said year;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 64, substituting as follows:

"SEC. 5. And hereafter the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall have the sole power and authority to appoint traders to the Indian tribes and to make such rules and regulations as he may deem just and proper, specifying the kind and quantity of goods and the prices at which such goods shall be sold to the Indians.

"SEC. 6. That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall advertise for all supplies: Provided, That the purchase of supplies for sixty days may be made in open market: And provided further, That to meet any exigency of the service purchases may be made in open market to an extent not to exceed $2,000 at any one time."

And the Senate agree to the same.

A. M. SCALES,
S. A. HURLBUT,
Managers on the part of the House.

WM. WINDOM,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
FRANCIS KERNAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. The material point of difference between the two Houses upon this bill was with reference to the transfer of the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department. The House has thrice indicated its purpose by a decided vote that this transfer should be made, both upon bills appropriating money and also in a separate bill which was sent to the Senate on the 25th April last, and has remained ever since unacted upon in that body. The time is now come when one body or the other must yield in that particular. The Senate declined, by their non-action, even to consider the bill which was sent to that body, as I have already stated, on the 25th of April, which was a separate and distinct bill to transfer this Bureau. In view of the Indian difficulties, we did not, on the part of the House, think it was wise to longer continue the opposition to the expressed will of the Senate.

As to the amounts of money involved in this bill, I will state that the bill as passed by the House, which proposed to accomplish the transfer and thus save a large sum which we thought could be saved, amounted in the aggregate to $3,979,602.11. The bill as passed by the Senate amounted to $4,958,361.27. The amount appropriated in this bill under the report of the committee of conference is $4,670,117.02, being a reduction from the appropriations of last year of $690,437.50.

With this statement I believe I will submit the question on the adoption of the report to the House. I am ready, however, to answer any question which may be put to me touching any of the details of this report.

The question was taken on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference; and it was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHN REILLY. I ask unanimous consent to submit some reports from the Committee on Military Affairs, not for consideration at this time, but that they may go upon the Calendar, and with the accompanying reports be printed.

Mr. CONGER. There was a request made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] before the presentation of the report of the committee of conference for permission to make some reports from the Committee on War Claims, which was objected to. Unless that objection is withdrawn, I object to this request.

Mr. HOAR. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the reports cannot be made.

INDIAN TROUBLES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has received from the President of the United States a communication, which he asks consent to lay before the House. The Clerk will read the communication from the President, which, with the accompanying documents, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a telegram of the 5th of August from Lieutenant-General Sheridan to General Sherman, a letter of the 11th of the present month from General Sherman to the Secretary of War, and a letter from the latter of the same date to me, all setting forth the possible needs of the Army in consequence of existing hostilities.

I would strongly urge upon Congress the necessity for making some provision for a contingency which may arise during the vacation for more troops in the Indian country than it is now possible to send. It would seem to me to be much more economical and better to authorize an increase of the present cavalry force by twenty-five hundred privates, but, if this is not deemed advisable, then that the President be authorized to call out not exceeding five regiments, one thousand strong each, of volunteers to serve for a period not exceeding six months.

Should this latter authority be given, I would not order out any volunteers unless in my opinion, based upon reports from the scene of war, I deemed it absolutely necessary, and then only the smallest number considered sufficient to meet the emergency.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 11, 1876.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that that communication and the accompanying documents be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and upon that motion I ask the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to inquire whether a bill upon that subject is not now pending?

Mr. THORNBURGH. There is a bill from the Senate in relation to the same subject on the Speaker's table, and I ask unanimous consent that it be taken up and referred, with the communication of the President, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRISON and others objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. HOAR. I make the point of order that the regular order of business is the unfinished business of yesterday, the completion of the hour of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not on Friday.

Mr. HOAR. Then I withdraw the call for the regular order.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I renew the call.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Chair hold that a motion to reconsider cannot be called up on Friday as well as any other day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unquestionably a motion to reconsider a public bill is not in order on Friday unless all private business has been disposed of.

TRADE-MARKS.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I submit a report from a committee of conference which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read the report as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 846) "To punish the counterfeiting of trade-mark goods and the sale or dealing in of counterfeit trade-mark goods" having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 5, and 10.

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 4 and 8.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: After the word "keep," in line 4, page 1 of the bill, insert the words "for sale or keep that others may sell;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 3, and agree to the clause proposed to be stricken out, with an amendment as follows: At the end of the section insert: "In all cases in which it appears that the person or party claiming said goods had, when he received the same, knowledge or notice that the same were such goods as this section describes;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 6, and agree to the same, with an amendment, so that the clause will read as follows: "With intent that the same be used for the purpose of deception and fraud;" and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 7, and agree to the same, with an amendment, so that the clause will read as follows: "With intent that the same be used for the purpose of deception and fraud;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 9, and agree to the section wherein said amendment occurs, amending said section so as to stand as follows: "That any person who shall, with intent to defraud any person or persons, knowingly and willfully aid or abet in the violation of any of the provisions of this act, shall upon conviction thereof be punished as prescribed in the first section of this act; and any person who shall commit any of the offenses specified in this act shall be deemed to have committed a crime, and may be proceeded against by arrest, indictment, and trial, as in other criminal cases, and the district courts of the United States shall have cognizance and jurisdiction to enforce this act;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. H. BAGLEY, JR.,
W. HARTZELL,
E. S. SAMPSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

ROSCOE CONKLING,
FREDERICK T. FRELINGHUYSEN,
J. W. STEVENSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The question was upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I would like to inquire of the Chair whether it is in order to move to postpone the consideration of this conference report until the next session of Congress?

Mr. RANDALL. The conference report can be voted down, in which case the bill would be lost; but it might be revived again.

Mr. GARFIELD. To vote down the conference report would kill the bill; to postpone the report until the next session does not necessarily kill the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I desire to say a very few words in relation to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York submitting the report [Mr. J. H. BAGLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I desire to say in reference to this report that we have had a full and free conference; and although there may be some features of this report which are objectionable to some gentlemen, yet we have done, after mature consideration, the best we could, and I think we have put the bill in a very acceptable shape. I do not know that I have any explanations to make in regard to this report. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. SAMPSON,] can perhaps give a better explanation of it than I can.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I will first yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. SAMPSON. I do not desire to take up any of the time of the House in discussing this report, unless it may appear that there are some sound reasons why it should not be adopted. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has any objection to this report, I am perfectly willing to hear his objection, and then I may desire to reply to him.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. My attention was called to this bill early in the session by a very large association in the city of New York known as the Junk Dealers' Association. I was surprised to learn that in the city of New York there were two thousand dealers in cast-off articles. I was asked to give some attention to this matter, and I tried to do so.

Now I confess before this House, to my humiliation, that this bill actually passed both Houses and went to this conference committee while I was sitting in my seat and I was utterly ignorant of the fact. I immediately called the attention of members of the House and of the Senate to the character of the bill. I had it examined by competent legal authority, and I have been assured that the bill cannot be executed without subjecting a large class of humble and respectable people to the very greatest hardships.

I have no doubt this bill contains many meritorious features in regard to trade-marks, and that some legislation is required for the better protection of trade-marks. But it seems to me it will be a mistake to carry into operation any such legislation without giving proper attention to the rights and interests of other portions of the community who have not been represented before the committee, as the owners of trade-marks have, by competent counsel.

The association of which I have spoken complained that they had had no opportunity to be heard before the committee of this House. They seem to have addressed a communication to the committee of the Senate, and that communication I understand was acknowledged, although I was informed by the president of the association that it had not been acknowledged.

I do not desire to defeat this bill; I desire to see it perfected. But it seems to me that to pass it under this report of the committee of conference would be doing very great injustice. Hence my inquiry of the Chair if it was in order to move to postpone the further consideration of this report until the next session of Congress, so that all parties interested might be heard and an opportunity given to secure proper legislation.

Let me explain to this House very briefly the nature of one provision of this bill. A poor man is passing along the street with a bottle under his arm; the bottle is marked Piper Heidsieck, or some other respectable name. Now, if there be a deputy marshal who is prepared to swear that this man has this bottle with intent to defraud, the man can be arrested and carried before a United States commissioner. In many portions of the country the United States commissioner cannot be found within fifty or one hundred miles. The man can be put under arrest and required to give bail, and perhaps all the property he has in the world is the bottle under his arm. Then comes the bill of fees for the marshal, for the commissioner, and for everybody else. I am assured by gentlemen here, and no doubt lawyers on this floor understand it much better than I do, that in different parts of this country there are deputy marshals and commissioners who are engaged in hunting up violations of the revenue laws for the express purpose of securing the fees.

The operations of this bill extend to almost every known class of cast-off articles; bottles, boxes, cigar-boxes, medicine vials, anything that any man may happen to cast aside and a poor fellow may pick up. If somebody will make the necessary affidavit against him, he may be arrested and put in any jail and kept there.

It is true that a provision requiring the showing of an intent to defraud (which was not in the original draught of this bill) has been inserted upon careful examination by the committee; and I thank them for it. But it seems to me that the whole measure is too full of danger to be passed at this late hour of the session without more thorough investigation. I appeal to my legal friends here—for they are the ones who ought to guard the interests of these poorer members of society, who are unable to protect themselves—I ask from them a careful examination of the provisions of this bill in order that they may say whether it is such legislation as an enlightened Congress ought to adopt. If, therefore, it be in order, I shall move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until the next session of Congress, in the hope that then a proper measure may be perfected which will satisfy all classes of the community.

Mr. SAMPSON. Mr. Speaker, the first objection which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] seems to make to this bill is that it has not been carefully considered; that it is hasty legislation. As I understand the history of this measure, it was introduced into the Senate perhaps some three months ago, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of that body, and after careful consideration by some of the ablest lawyers upon that committee, was reported back to the Senate and after discussion sent to this House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] called up the bill here and asked unanimous consent that it might be considered and passed immediately. I called his attention to the fact that the bill embraced some objectionable features under which innocent men might be punished. I was anxious to have inserted in the bill a provision requiring proof of intent to defraud—requiring the Government to prove affirmatively in every case that this cast-off property to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has referred was held with intent to defraud. Upon that suggestion of mine, the gentleman consented to the reference of the bill to the Committee on Patents. It was carefully considered by that committee, upon which there are a number of legal gentlemen; and the provision requiring proof of intent to defraud was inserted in every case where it appeared necessary for the protection of innocent parties. After full consideration by that committee the bill came back to the House with amendments, and was here discussed. Gentlemen will remember that there was quite a struggle to obtain the floor for the purpose of having those amendments considered. The bill was discussed, the reasons for the amendments given; and the bill was passed as amended without a dissenting voice. Upon its return to the Senate that body refused to concur in the amendments of the House and a conference committee was appointed.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has complained that a friend or constituent of his has been denied the opportunity to make a proper showing before the committee. I believe he has reference to the president of the Junk Association of New York City, an association numbering some two or three thousand members. Now, the fact is that that gentleman has been in communication with a member of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate ever since the early part of June. He then opened a correspondence, and letters have passed back and forth between those gentlemen. His case as made out by letter was submitted to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and was fully considered. His opposition to the measure had relation to this very provision relating to empty bottles. Now, in order to show the House that this is not an objectionable feature, I desire to read the section relating to that subject:

That any person who shall, with intent to injure or defraud the owner of any trade-mark, or any other person lawfully entitled to use or protect the same, buy, sell, offer for sale, deal in, or have in his possession any used or empty box, envelope, wrapper, case, bottle, or other package to which is affixed, so that the same may be obliterated without substantial injury to such box or other thing aforesaid, any trade-mark, registered pursuant to the statutes of the United States, not so defaced, erased, obliterated, and destroyed as to prevent its fraudulent use, shall, on conviction thereof, be punished as prescribed in the first section of this act.

Now, if the trade-mark is a part of the bottle—if it is blown into the bottle so that it cannot be erased—there is no offense. But if the trade-mark is a paper label stuck upon the bottle, so that it must be rubbed off unless the person having it in his possession takes pains to keep it there, then it will be some evidence perhaps that he intends to violate the law. If he cannot wash the bottle without washing off the label unless he takes especial pains to keep it on, this may be evidence of intent to defraud. But this intent must appear by some affirmative evidence. The burden of proof rests upon the Government. If a man has in his possession bottles with trade-mark labels upon them, all he has to do to avoid the very appearance of evil is to wash off the labels. It seems to me it cannot be claimed in reason that there is any hardship in the provisions of this bill as now amended.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] says that an innocent man may be arrested for having in his possession a bottle with a counterfeit trade-mark. So a man may be walking through the streets with a half dollar in his pocket which some man may claim is counterfeit, and he may be arrested upon the charge of having counterfeit money in his possession. There is the same possibility of hardship in every case where a man may be alleged to have any counterfeit property in his possession. We have, however, been very careful to guard all these sections so as to throw upon the Government the burden of proving the intent to defraud. In fact it seemed to be the opinion of some gentlemen interested in this bill that in this manner it had been so diluted as to be of little value for the punishment of those who may deal in counterfeit trade-marks. I think that certainly if we are going to pass any bill on this subject, this is in as mild a form as any gentleman could wish. We have sought to render it impossible that any innocent man shall be punished.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman state the penalty?

Mr. SAMPSON. The maximum punishment is a fine of $2,000 and imprisonment for two years, but the penalty may be as light as imprisonment for one minute and a fine of one cent, as the whole matter rests within the discretion of the court. A large latitude in respect to the penalty is intentionally given. If a man is found having in his possession but a single package or bottle bearing a counterfeit trade-mark, and if this is his only offense, the court may make the penalty extremely light.

Although the gentleman from New York seems now so apprehensive in regard to punishments, he introduced in this House and had referred to the Committee on Patents a bill in which the punishment for the use of counterfeit trade-marks was fixed at imprisonment for ten years and a fine not exceeding $5,000. Under this bill the punishment cannot exceed imprisonment for two years and a fine of $2,000, while it may be as much less as the court within its discretion may deem proper.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] states that I introduced bills for the protection of trade-marks containing severer penalties than those in the bill under discussion. That is true; but he ought to remember that gentlemen often introduce bills at the request of other parties for the provisions of which they do not hold themselves responsible. The bills referred to were handed to me by respectable members of the bar, and I introduced them without giving any sanction to the provisions of the bills myself.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, when this bill which was passed in the Senate was referred to the Committee on Patents, it seemed to me to be a bill solely in the interest of those to whom by law privileges had been given in connection with trade-marks that its provisions were so harsh and so severe, and the penalty so high, the imprisonment so long necessarily, with no requirement that fraudulent intent should be alleged and proved, that I was very much opposed to it, as were other members of the Committee on Patents. It was considered for a long time by that committee very carefully. I think if the bill has been agreed upon substantially by the conference committee as it finally passed the House the interests of the people are fairly protected, and the interests of those who have rights under the trade-mark law are equally well protected. I am not certain, as I have not looked into it, whether this contains the section which makes it purely a criminal offense and which was struck out by the House.

Mr. SAMPSON. That was not restored in the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. If that were restored by this conference committee I should myself oppose the passage of this bill now or at any time, and I should ask gentlemen of the House to oppose it upon what I believe to be abundantly sufficient ground. But the gentleman who has charge of the bill informs me that the section stricken out by the committee of conference has not been restored. If it has not and sufficient guard against abuse of prosecutions is inserted by the Committee on Patents in the Senate bill—if those are retained, I can see no real objection to its passage.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I demanded the previous question.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I made a motion before the previous question was called to postpone the consideration of the question until next session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman had not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Is it in order now to move it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman had not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Is it in order now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has not the floor now for that purpose.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 42.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred on ordering the main question to be now put.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 56.

So the main question was ordered to be put.

The question recurred on the adoption of the report.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 70.

Mr. FRANKLIN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 69, nays 83, not voting 133; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, Banks, Bradley, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Caswell, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, Conger, Crounse, Cutler, Davy, Eames, Egbert, Evans, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Hancock, Haymond, Henderson, Hoar, Hurd, Hurlbut, Hyman, Joyce, Kasson, Kehr, Kimball, Franklin Landers, Lapham, Lawrence, Lord, Lynch, McCrary, McDill, Monroe, Morgan, Nash, Norton, O'Neill, Packer, Page, William A. Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, James D. Williams, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodburn, Woodworth, and Young—133.

So the report was rejected.

During the vote,

Mr. HUNTON stated that Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, was paired with Mr. MILLER, of New York; and Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, with Mr. HOGE, of South Carolina.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MORRISON. I submit the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, directed to adjourn their respective Houses without day on Monday next, August 14, 1876, at four o'clock p. m.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. SINGLETON. I rise to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. I am directed to report back the bill (S. No. 1036) to provide for the printing and distribution of the reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the years 1874 and 1875, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. Speaker, on an early day of this session we passed a resolution to print exactly the same number of copies of the Agricultural Reports for the years 1874 and 1875 as are provided for in this bill. It went to the Senate, and they, instead of taking up the resolution passed by this House, have sent us a new bill. There is very little difference between the resolution adopted by the House and this bill. There is a difference, I think, only in one respect. When the Committee on Appropriations reported the sundry civil bill an amount was appropriated for the Government Printing Establishment, and out of that amount these reports were to be paid for. It was then supposed that there would be a reduction in the number of the employés of that Department, and that there would be enough money left to pay for the reports. On examination it was found to be otherwise, and the Senate proposed to have these reports printed; and for that purpose the bill appropriates $130,000, or so much as may be necessary, to have them printed. While I am in favor of retrenchment and reform, I think this is a proper expenditure.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELISHA E. RICE.

Mr. BANKS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. No. 852) for the relief of Elisha E. Rice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read. It authorizes the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow and pay to E. E. Rice, late United States consul at Hakodadi, Japan, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $585.41, being 10 per cent. of his salary as consul at said port from July 1, 1869, to November 3, 1871, that being the usual allowance for rent of that consulate.

Mr. BANKS. If the House will give me its attention for one minute, I can state the facts of this case. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has unanimously approved of this bill. Mr. Rice was consul in Japan at Hakodadi. The First Comptroller, in a communication to the Senate Committee on Claims, which is printed in their report, states that Mr. Rice is entitled to 10 per cent. of his salary as rent, which was never paid to him, but which was due to him. Mr. Rice needs it in these days, and I hope the House will agree to give it to him.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 1021) allowing the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails in their new iron steamships.

The message further informed the House that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3168) relating to the partition of real estate in the District of Columbia, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. STEVENSON.

The message further informed the House that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1516) to regulate the issue of artificial limbs to disabled soldiers, seamen, and others, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. LOGAN, Mr. BOOTH, and Mr. GORDON.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I rise to a privileged report.

Mr. CONGER. I now renew my request that the Committee on War Claims may report some bills to be placed on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has just recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] to ask unanimous consent to make a report.

WILLIAM BATTERSBY.

Mr. CAULFIELD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1151) for the relief of William Battersby; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

EXPENSES OF THE DISTRICT.

On motion of Mr. WILLARD, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 3962) providing means to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia until December 1, 1876, with amendments by the Senate, was taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. WILLARD. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, and ask a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair appoints as managers of the conference which the House has just agreed to request, Mr. WILLARD of Michigan, Mr. CATE of Wisconsin, and Mr. HARTRIDGE of Georgia.

MOSES F. CARLTON.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2386) for the relief of Moses F. Carlton, late second lieutenant Company I, Fourth Michigan Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN B. SLACK.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, also, from the same committee, reported back, with an unfavorable recommendation, the petition of John B. Slack, late a third assistant engineer in the United States Navy; which was laid on the table, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

F. W. E. LOHMAN.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, also, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the memorial of F. W. E. Lohman; and the same was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

J. C. M'CONNELL.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, also, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the claim of J. C. McConnell; and the same was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

O. P. NORRIS.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, also, from the same committee, reported back, with an adverse report, the bill (H. R. No. 2357) for the relief of Lieutenant O. P. Norris, of the One hundred and eleventh Ohio Volunteers; and the same was laid on the table, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF EMPLOYÉS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. ROBERTS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Accounts, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund to John H. Shaw, Richard A. Shaw, Wilson Grice, Robert Coates, Henry Hall, William H. Hall, Daniel Spagges, and James Savoy, each, $6 per month during this session, deducting such sums as may have already been paid them. This resolution to be considered as a substitute for the resolution passed on the 29th of July last, so far as it relates to the above-named parties.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GILDEROY A. HARDY.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 944) for the relief of Gilderoy A. Hardy was taken from the Speaker's table, received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. EVANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I rise to a privileged question. I ask that additional members be appointed on the Committee on Enrolled Bills, on account of the absence of the majority of that committee. There are but two members of the committee present, Mr. PLAISTED and myself. Mr. PLAISTED is a member of a committee of investigation, and he assures me that it is impossible that he should discharge the duties of this committee. It is therefore absolutely necessary that additional members should be appointed upon the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How many?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I think two will be sufficient.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will announce the additional members of the committee in the morning.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Pending a motion to adjourn, Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 561) for the relief of Major Junius D. Traynor; and

A bill (S. No. 1007) concerning the employment of Indian scouts.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TUCKER was granted leave of absence for two days on account of important business.

Mr. DARRALL was granted leave of absence for four days on account of sickness.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY was granted leave of absence for ten days.

Mr. MILLER was granted leave of absence for ten days.

Mr. SPARKS was granted an extension of the leave of absence heretofore granted him for ten days.

Mr. DAVY was granted leave of absence for ten days on account of important business.

Mr. ATKINS. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

REUBEN DAVIS.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for action at the present time the bill (S. No. 990) for the removal of the political disabilities of Reuben Davis, of Mississippi.

No objection was made, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, received its several readings, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) was passed.

Mr. HOOKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. RUSK. I ask unanimous consent to print some remarks in regard to the tariff in its relations to agriculture in the RECORD as a part of the proceedings of the House.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

And then, on motion of Mr. PAGE, (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. DAVY: The petition of nurserymen, horticulturists, and florists of Rochester, New York, and vicinity, that no appropriation be made for the distribution of seeds through the Agricultural Bureau and that the postage on all seeds and plants be reduced, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. HENKLE: Memorial of Alexander Moffit and M. McEwen, that the petition of Alexander Moffit and others for the appointment of a joint committee of the House and Senate to continue the investigation of the charges made against the management of the Government Hospital for the Insane be reported back to the House from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of James Burk, of the District of Columbia, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. LAWRENCE: The petition of M. McEwen, of Washington, District of Columbia, that he be paid the amount of witness fees due Mary J. Van Keuren, she having assigned to him her interest in the same, to the Committee of Accounts.

By Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS: The petition of Elizabeth Craig, the mother of Prince Albert Craig, late of the One Hundred and second Regiment, United States Colored Troops, who was killed during the late war, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 12, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3083) to remove the political disabilities of C. M. Wilcox, of Maryland, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the fact that this case was included in a bill passed yesterday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. By an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let this bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The action yesterday violates all the practice of the Senate. There will not be any more disability bills passed at this session if they are going to be doubled up in that way. Let each case stand on its own bottom.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 164) in reference to the payment of awards of the Venezuelan mixed commission was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EXPENSES OF DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3962) to provide means to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia until December 1, 1876, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. WINDOM, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. KERNAN.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Reso'ved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, directed to adjourn their respective Houses without day on Monday next, August 14, 1876, at four o'clock p. m.

Mr. WINDOM. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PADDOCK. I suggest that it lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope not. I hope the Senate will dispose of it now.

Mr. PADDOCK. It had better lie on the table.

Mr. MORRILL. Let it lie on the table.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to letting it lie upon the table. The Senate is not ready to act upon it now.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it ought to be within reach of the Senate at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table if there be no objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 620) for the relief of Redick McKee, reported it without amendment.

CHANGE OF NAME OF YACHT.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3678) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Lydia to that of Sylph, to report it without amendment. As there is not likely to be any debate upon the bill, I ask for its present consideration. It is merely to change the name of a pleasure-yacht.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1045) for the relief of George A. Eades, late collector of customs at Sitka, Alaska; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing reported two bills yesterday as substitutes for two resolutions, for printing, one additional copies of the impeachment trial and the other additional copies of the report of the engineers upon the alluvial deposits of the Mississippi. It has always been the custom for the Senate to consider immediately reports from the Committee on Printing ordering additional copies, and for the obvious reason that it is more economical to print them at once than it is to make a delay which may involve a resetting of the type. That objection does not apply in the case of the bill ordering copies of the impeachment, which is stereotyped; but still it would be more economical to do it now than to do it by and by. Without intending to urge the matter at all, I should like to have it disposed of. I would say that I think both of these matters are desired by the House of Representatives, and as neither House can order more than $500 worth of printing without the concurrence of the other, I think it is a matter of courtesy, when the expense is not large, that each House should defer to the other, and I hope, if we set the example, it will be followed; although it has not always been followed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island make a motion?

Mr. ANTHONY. I cannot make a motion to take precedence of the morning business. I have to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas rise with morning business?

Mr. INGALLS. I rise to ask the consideration of a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island has risen for that purpose.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1042) to provide for the publication of the report of the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap, which was reported yesterday. [After a pause.] I am advised that the bill has not been returned from the Printer. If that is the case we cannot take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been returned, the Chair is informed.

LANDS IN CHEROKEE STRIP.

Mr. HARVEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1984) to provide for the sale of certain lands in Kansas.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be reported for information.

Mr. HARVEY. I ask that the Secretary read the papers accompanying the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information subject to the action of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the papers read.

Mr. HARVEY. I ask the Secretary to read the letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the letters of the Cherokee delegation relating to this matter.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator whether this bill comes regularly from a committee.

Mr. HARVEY. It was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY,] and that Senator and myself agreed that whoever could get the floor first for the purpose should call the bill up for consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. It has been on the Calendar for two weeks.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Has it passed the House?

Mr. INGALLS. It is a House bill.

Mr. HARVEY. If the Senators will listen to the reading of the papers, I think they will be satisfied. There are no conflicting claims involved at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers have been sent for.

PAVING OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Mr. MORRILL. While we are waiting for the papers I ask the Senate again to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4085) to repeal part of section 5 of an act entitled "An act authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue," approved July 19, 1876. I venture to assure the Senate that this is not for the benefit of any contractors. It is not the desire that there shall be a time fixed, but in order to accomplish the work as nearly as possible within the time, in the very best manner, it is thought the bill should be passed. I ask that this bill, which was taken up yesterday morning, be taken up again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the bill for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator if we had not better fix a date?

Mr. MORRILL. I will say to the Senator from West Virginia that if we fix the date the contractors will claim that they have the right to go to that point of time. We do not want to have the date fixed because we believe it can be done earlier. The bill is only to provide for some extraordinary contingency which might occur, which would require the commissioners to have the work relet or something of that sort, in consequence of any dereliction of duty on the part of the men who may take the contract.

Mr. DAVIS. I am in favor of the extension; but my thought was that it had better be limited to some particular time, for it might run a year.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think we shall want it extended more than a week or ten days at the outside, possibly not that.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not insist upon the bill until the Senator from Maryland [Mr. DENNIS] is here, who wishes to be heard upon this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will listen to me, I will state that the Senator from Maryland desires to be present when this bill is taken up. It is only upon that ground that I think it is due to him, he not being here, that I should object. I only act in behalf of a brother Senator who I understand wants to be present.

Mr. MORRILL. We have but a little time, and I do not think that the Senator from Maryland, if he understands the fact, will object in the least.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand that he desires to be present.

Mr. HARVEY. I call for the reading of the papers in regard to the bill I called up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers being here they will be read, if the Senator insists.

Mr. HARVEY. I must insist on the consideration of the bill.

LANDS IN CHEROKEE STRIP.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1984) to provide for the sale of certain lands in Kansas. The preamble recites that certain lands in the State of Kansas known as the Cherokee strip, being a strip of land on the southern boundary of Kansas, some two or three miles wide, detached from the lands patented to the Cherokee Nation by the act known as the Kansas-Nebraska bill, in defining the boundaries thereof, are still, so far as unsold, the property of the Cherokee Nation; and that an act was passed by the Forty-second Congress, which became a law on its acceptance by the Cherokee national authorities, and which fixed the price of the lands east of Arkansas River at $2 per acre, and west of the river at $1.50 per acre; and that portions of the same have been sold under this law and portions remain unsold, the price being too high.

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall offer for sale to settlers all of the tract remaining unsold at the local land offices in the districts in which it is situated at $1.25 per acre; and all remaining unsold after one year from the date at which they are so offered for sale at the local land offices are to be sold by the Secretary of the Interior for cash, in quantities or tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, at not less than $1 per acre.

Section 2 provides that the proceeds shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and placed to the credit of the Cherokee Nation, and shall be paid to the treasurer of the Cherokee Nation on the order of the legislative council of the Cherokee Nation or a delegation thereof duly authorized.

Section 3 provides that the act shall take effect and be in force from the date of its acceptance by the Legislature of the Cherokee Nation or of a delegation thereof duly authorized, who shall file certificate of such acceptance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter referred to by the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., June 8, 1876.

SIR: In compliance with your verbal request, I have examined the provisions of House bill No. 1984, providing for the sale of the unsold portion of certain lands in the State of Kansas known as the "Cherokee strip."

The provisions of the bill meet with my approval and I know of no objection to its passage.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. Q. SMITH, Commissioner.

Hon. W R. BROWN,
House of Representatives.

P. S.—The provision in reference to the payment of interest contained in the second section of the bill should, in my judgment, be stricken out, inasmuch as the money is not to be permanently invested in Government stocks, but to be paid over to the Cherokees.

J. Q. SMITH, Commissioner.

Mr. HARVEY. I will state that the bill was amended in the House according to that recommendation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a letter from the Secretary of the Interior? That is only from the Commissioner. Does the head of the Department recommend it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no letter from the Secretary of the Interior among the papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is very bad practice, not having the responsibility of the Department.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not quite understand why any of this land is to be sold for a dollar and a quarter an acre.

Mr. HARVEY. This bill has been in committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I never saw this bill before.

Mr. HARVEY. It was reported. I will show it to the Senator on the Calendar.

Mr. WINDOM. If this bill is objected to, I ask leave to make a report from a committee.

Mr. HARVEY. The further reading of the papers will refresh the recollection of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to hear some paper read to indicate that this land cannot be sold at the price originally proposed. It seems to me that land of this character in the State of Kansas ought to be worth more than a dollar an acre.

Mr. INGALLS. In response to the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa, I beg to assure him that the terms of the bill specifically provide that it shall not become operative without the consent of the Cherokee Nation of Indians, who own the land, and therefore there can be no possible objection to the passage upon the score that the Senator urges.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas or the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs whether there are any settlers on this strip on the lands that have not yet been sold.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know. There are settlers on the lands under the previous laws that have been passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but I am speaking of these lands that are not yet sold.

Mr. INGALLS. About that I cannot say. The Senator will permit me to remark that this is a very peculiarly-shaped tract of land. It was discovered upon a permanent survey of the State of Kansas that it lapped over on to the boundaries of our State. It extends from the Neosho River on the east, where it is about four miles wide, nearly two hundred miles in length, and tapering off until it is about a mile and a half or two miles to the western extremity. It has been attempted under previous laws to be placed upon the market; and as this legislation is to be effectual only when the Cherokee Nation assent to it, it seems to me there can be no objection to it.

Mr. HARVEY. I will state further that a large proportion of this land has already been sold, and the Cherokee Indians are anxious that this bill should pass placing the refuse or portions of the land that it has been impossible to sell for the former price at such a price as it can be now sold for. It is very evident to any one having knowledge of agricultural lands in any country that there are portions of any tract that will be in a great degree unsalable.

If the Senator will listen to the reading of the letters now in the hands of the Secretary, which were referred to the committee and considered there, he will see that the delegation representing the Cherokee Indians are earnestly requesting the passage of this bill.

The bill was referred, I will say, originally by the Senate to the Committee on Public Lands, and was there taken up; but, inasmuch as it related to Indian lands, by a vote of that committee it was reported back with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. It was so referred. It was there considered and reported by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY,] who is a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs; but, he being chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, in printing the Calendar it appears to have been reported from the Committee on Public Lands. In reality it was before both committees, but was reported to the Senate from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I ask that the Secretary read the letters from the Cherokee delegation in relation to this matter.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 11, 1876.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed please to find bill H. R. No. 1984, which has passed the House of Representatives and is now pending before your honorable Committee on Public Lands. Our delegation favor this bill, and as the Cherokees need the money due on them, and as the bill proposes to reduce the price of the lands in favor of the settlers, we respectfully ask that you push forward the bill to favorable action this session of Congress.

By so doing you will oblige, very respectfully, your friends and obedient servants,

D. H. ROSS,
Chairman.
W. P. ADAIR,
J. L. ADAIR,
Cherokee Delegation.

Hon. J. M. HARVEY,
United States Senate Chamber.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 16, 1876.

DEAR SIR: There is now before you a bill which recently passed the House of Representatives providing for a settlement with the Cherokees for their "strip" of lands in your State. The bill, we are advised, is before your Committee on Public Lands. Will you please to call it up and have it acted upon as early as possible? You will by so doing place us under many obligations to you.

Truly your friends and obedient servants,

D. H. ROSS,
W. P. ADAIR,
J. L. ADAIR,
R. O. ROSS,
Cherokee Delegation.

Hon. JAS. M. HARVEY, U. S. S.,
United States Senate Chamber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are one or two things that I should like to know about this bill. First, I should like to ask the Senator who reported it, or the two committees who have considered it, whether there is any occupancy or claim to the lands embraced in this bill adverse to the clear title of the Indians who are to have the money?

Mr. HARVEY. I think not. The claim of the Indians to the ownership of the land is and has been unquestioned. The circumstances are these: Years ago the General Government patented to the Cherokee nation a certain quantity of land. Afterward, Congress, in establishing the Territory of Kansas, made the thirty-seventh parallel of latitude its boundary. In surveying that boundary a small strip of land from a mile and a half to two miles wide was left upon the north of that line, leaving it within the jurisdiction of the State of Kansas, but leaving the ownership of the land unquestioned in the Cherokees. The Cherokee Nation being desirous of disposing of that portion of the land, got a bill passed (as this bill recites) by the Congress, providing for the sale of the lands on the terms therein specified, and to be approved by the Cherokee national council, as this bill provides. Under that law such of the lands as would bring the price provided for have been sold; and there is no question of any adverse claim or any one claiming under any right in opposition to the Cherokee Indians. It is simply a question as to whether the land that is left unsold is worth as much as the former law provided for, and these Indians being satisfied that such is not the case are now anxious and willing to sell it for the price provided for in this bill. This bill provides that before it takes effect it shall be approved by the Cherokee national council.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I understand. So, if I correctly understand the Senator, he has answered my question in the affirmative, that there is no adverse claims by settlers or squatters or pre-emptors or homestead men or the State of Kansas or railroad grants or anything against the right of the Indians to these lands. There can be no doubt but that they belong to them.

Mr. HARVEY. If there is any adverse claim I have never heard it asserted. So far as I know the ownership of the Cherokee nation in the land is unquestioned.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Were these lands patented to the Cherokees?

Mr. HARVEY. As I understand, not only these lands but a large tract south of them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know about the large tract south of them; but do the patents embrace these lands?

Mr. HARVEY. Yes, sir; as I understand it, the original patent extended beyond what is now established as the boundary of the Indian Territory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then if these Indians now hold these lands by patent, where is the necessity of any intervention by the United States at all?

Mr. HARVEY. It is because of a law passed by Congress.

Mr. KERNAN. If the Senator will yield to me, I wish to ask the Senate to take up a bill that should be considered for public reasons.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will interrupt the course of my oration a good deal, but I will yield nevertheless.

Mr. KERNAN. I move to take up Senate bill No. 994, to amend section 2931 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to allow repayment by the Secretary of the Treasury of the tonnage tax where it has been exacted in contravention of treaty provisions. There is a short report accompanying the bill. It ought to be passed.

Mr. MORRILL. Before that is done I understand the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Delaware have withdrawn their objection to the District bill, and I ask to have the question taken on that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We cannot do but one thing at a time, and that one is this Indian question.

Mr. KERNAN. Let Senate bill No. 994 be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, we will not have it read now. We shall get on faster if we do one thing at a time.

Mr. HARVEY. Here is the law to which I referred, which I will read:

Whereas in order that certain provisions of the treaty of July 19, 1866, between the United States and the Cherokee Nation may be rendered clearer and made more satisfactory to settlers upon the lands known as the "Cherokee strip," in the State of Kansas, said settlers having moved thereon since the date of said treaty, and for the purpose of facilitating the sale of said lands: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the strip of land lying west of the Neosho River, and included in the State of Kansas, conveyed to the Cherokee Nation of Indians by the United States, and now belonging to said nation, shall be surveyed, under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in the same manner as the public lands of the United States are surveyed, and shall be by him offered for sale under the provisions and restrictions of this act; and all the lands in said tract lying east of the Arkansas River shall be sold at $2 per acre, and all lands in said tract lying west of said river shall be sold at $1.50 per acre, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That where there is a fraction of land less than forty acres, the same shall be sold with the contiguous tract, expense of survey to be paid out of the proceeds of said land in accordance with the treaty of July 9, 1866.

Then follow certain provisions as to what shall be necessary preliminary to a purchase. This act provided, as the bill under consideration does, for the acceptance of it by the Cherokee national council or by delegations duly authorized thereby.

Which acceptance shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior and when provided by him the same shall be final and conclusive.

I will state for the satisfaction of the Senator from Vermont and the Senate that some days ago when attempting to get this bill up, I telegraphed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to know whether this acceptance had ever been legally filed, and received in answer thereto a telegram from the Commissioner through the departmental telegraph stating that it had been accepted. That telegram I have left in the volume of laws relating to this subject and the books have been displaced somewhat and I am, as yet, unable to find the telegram.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would not be material, because to be a valid acceptance of this act it must be an acceptance of the act, and not of something before the act.

Mr. HARVEY. I was showing the Senate why it was necessary to pass this bill. The bill under consideration is made in consequence of the existence of the law which I have read and is alike submitted for the approval of the national council of the Cherokees and for the same reasons. I think the Senator from Vermont and every Senator here must be satisfied on the evidence before the Senate that there is no conflict of interests here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I wanted to get at, because it has happened so often that, when we have undertaken to do one thing in respect of lands that appeared to be perfectly right, it has turned out that there was another interest that had to be taken care of afterward; and now if in this case, under any act of Congress which would authorize it, if there be any such, settlers have gone on these lands and are entitled to take them under different conditions than this bill prescribes and so the Indians do not get the money, then the Indians would come and say, and would have a right to say as far as the Senator has stated the case, if the lands are patented to them "the United States must pay us for these lands over again." On the other hand, if we sell them outright under the provisions of this bill to anybody that will buy them and some of the settlers are squeezed off, then they will come and say, "Now Congress must indemnify us;" and that led me to make the inquiry.

Mr. HARVEY. The Senator is satisfied that the conditions are only modified in so far as relates to price and that at the request of the representatives of these Indians. The conditions otherwise are the same as those provided for in the law I have just read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that were correct it would go a good way toward satisfying me that my friend is right and that there could be no danger; but let us see if that is the true construction of the bill.

Whereas portions of the same—

Not to take up time in reading the whereases, but condensed as much as possible—

portions of the same have been sold under said law and portions remain unsold, the price being too high: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary shall offer for sale to settlers all of said tract remaining unsold at the passage of this act, at the local land offices in the districts in which it is situated, at $1 25 per acre; and all of said lands remaining unsold after one year from the date at which they are so offered for sale at the local land offices shall be sold by the Secretary of the Interior for cash, in quantities or tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, at not less than $1 per acre.

It does not say, if that is the point of my friend, "in conformity in other respects to the provisions of the act which this is intended to supplement." If it did, I should see that we should be likely not to get into any difficulty. But this, although it recites a former act which has failed of being executed, makes an entire new one.

Mr. HARVEY. The Senator will see that it refers to the former law which I have just read, and is simply a modification of that law so as to place these lands for sale at such a price as they will bring by reason of their quality being inferior to those which have already been disposed of under the act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That can be corrected in a moment. I move to amend, and that will relieve my difficulty on that point, by inserting after the word "act," in line 4, at the bottom of page 1, these words:

In accordance with the provisions of said former act, except as hereinafter stated as to price.

I suppose there is no objection to that. That will relieve it of all difficulty about its being an open sale probably.

Mr. HARVEY. The only difficulty about an amendment to this bill at this time in the session is the fact that so many members of the House of Representatives are now away from the city that it is doubtful whether a quorum can be secured to consider amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we cannot get a quorum there, we shall not adjourn.

Mr. HARVEY. As both parties in interest in this bill are in favor of its passage in the shape that it is, I certainly hope that my friend the Senator from Vermont will not insist upon amending it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nothing would make me more happy than to gratify my friend from Kansas or promote his interests; but I feel obliged, as far as it lies in my humble power to promote the public interest, to secure the United States against the possibility of reclamations; and inasmuch as he now states to relieve another difficulty that I had that this rests upon the old act that he has read and is in pursuance of that, I wish to make it say so as it plainly does not say now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. INGALLS. The third section of this bill declares in terms—

That this act shall take effect and be in force from the date of its acceptance by the legislature of the Cherokee Nation, or of a delegation thereof duly authorized, who shall file certificate of such acceptance.

It does appear to me, with the greatest deference to the judgment of the Senator from Vermont, that inasmuch as these lands have been patented and are now the private property of the Cherokee Nation just as much the Senator's homestead is his private property, if we limit this sale and make it subject to the condition that the owners of the property themselves in fee shall be satisfied, there ought to be no objection raised in the Senate to the passage of the bill. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be rejected, and that the bill will pass as it came from the House.

The amendment was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 12, noes 24.

Mr. ALLISON. I think in line 3 of section 3 the words "or of a delegation thereof duly authorized" should be struck out. It seems to me this ought to receive the sanction of the legislature of the Cherokee Nation if it is to become a law. I do not see how we can authorize a delegation of the legislature to do an act which they ought to do themselves.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill does not call even for that. It is capable of a construction which will allow a delegation that is duly authorized in general, to assent. I of course do not mean that it was drawn for that purpose.

Mr. HARVEY. That is an exact copy I believe of the provision of the former law on the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it is, an exact copy.

Mr. HARVEY. The only objection I should have to the amendment would be the one I suggested before, the fear of not being able to get a concurrence on the part of the House at this late day in the session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a very poor reason for opposing a proper amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I agree that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa ought to prevail. I have had experience which leads me to make the statement that the agents of these civilized Indian tribes come to Washington with a general authority to do everything that they choose to do in the name and on behalf of their principals, and this unquestionably will be done forthwith by these Indians if this bill passes, possibly without the knowledge of the Cherokee Nation.

Mr. HARVEY. On behalf of the committee I will accept the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment cannot be accepted. It must be voted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, to strike out the words "or of a delegation thereof duly authorized" in line 3 of section 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any objection now when the bill gets out of committee to inserting the words that I proposed, as the bill has to go back to the House, so as to make it really refer to the former act which the Senator from Kansas says is the purpose?

Mr. HARVEY. I have not had time to examine the effect of that amendment or to confer with those who have been urging the passage of this bill, the representatives of the Cherokee Nation. I would prefer that the bill should not be amended any further.

Mr. OGLESBY. Has the bill been amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been.

Mr. OGLESBY. I understood the Senator from Kansas consented to that.

Mr. HARVEY. That was an amendment at the end of the clause as to the assent of the Cherokee Nation.

Mr. OGLESBY. I know what it is. I understood there was no objection to it.

Mr. HARVEY. None to that amendment.

Mr. OGLESBY. That sends the bill back to the House of Representatives. There is no particular consequence in that amendment.

Mr. HARVEY. The Senator from Massachusetts states that a like provision has led to difficulty. I hope the bill will be passed without further amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. In section 2, lines 5 and 6, I move to strike out "or a delegation thereof duly authorized." I think this money at least ought to go to the Cherokee Nation.

Mr. HARVEY. I agree to that. It involves the same question as the former amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, this bill having been amended, the ground of not agreeing to the amendment that I offered, which was stated before, that it would involve its going back to the House, which is not ever any satisfactory ground to an amendment of substance, leads me to offer it again in the Senate, and now I wish Senators to hear what I have to say. This bill now says:

That the Secretary shall offer for sale to settlers all of said tract remaining unsold at the passage of this act, at the local land offices in the districts in which it is situated, at $1.25 per acre; and all of said lands remaining unsold after one year from the date at which they are so offered for sale at the local land offices shall be sold by the Secretary of the Interior for cash, in quantities or tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, at not less than $1 per acre.

Taking this bill on the face of it, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to sell these lands during the first year of their offering to any kind of settler, a man who has been on them for five years or has gone on for the purpose of purchase and squeezed somebody off, and at a credit that is unlimited, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. I should have said that the words alone required a sale for cash; but when you come to the end of the year the words that it shall be sold for cash after that, taken in connection with the former sentence that they are not so required to be sold, would plainly import, taking the section all together, that there is an unlimited discretion in the Secretary to sell on just such credit and time as he pleases. When I turn back to the other act which it is said has only failed because the price was too high, I find this:

That each person being the head of a family——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope we shall be allowed to finish this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not think I ought to yield.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall not occupy three minutes. I do not want the Senator from Kansas delayed in getting a vote on this bill. I hope we shall have five minutes.

Mr. SARGENT. I will let it run for five minutes subject to a call for the regular order. I cannot yield for any other purpose, however.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now this is in the act which merely failed because the price was too high:

That each person being the head of a family or over twenty-one years of age who has made a bona fide settlement and improvement upon any portion of said lands, and is now occupying the same, or, in case of his or her death, the heirs of such, or, if such heirs are minors, their guardians for them, shall be entitled to enter and purchase the lands so settled upon and occupied, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, at the price fixed in the first section of this act, payment for which shall be made at any time within one year from the date of the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of the acceptance of the provisions of this act, as provided for in the fifth section hereof; and all persons heads of families or over twenty-one years of age who may settle upon said lands at any time within one year from the date of the passage of this act may purchase the land so settled upon, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, at the price fixed in the first section of this act, and shall make payment therefor within one year from the date of said settlement.

At the end of the year there is to be a sale on public advertisement of certain tracts, provided there is no contest about the land, which would seem to imply that there was some contesting claim of some sort. This bill, you see, unless it is made particularly to refer to the conditions of the first act, sets the whole thing at large in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, who of course cannot attend to it personally, and of the agents of these Indians, for speculation, for unlimited credit or short credit or whatever that might be deemed most advantageous, and then to sell the balance at private sale for cash without any advertisement at all. I do appeal to my friend from Kansas not to resist my amendment.

Mr. HARVEY. Inasmuch as the morning hour has expired and we are proceeding at the sufferance of the Senator from California, I will make no further opposition to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I have done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont voted down in Committee of the Whole and now renewed in the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE HAWAIIAN TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875.

Mr. WINDOM. Would it be imposing on the Senator from California to ask a moment to present a bill from the Committee on Appropriations? If it be objected to, I will not ask it.

Mr. SARGENT. I am afraid it would be imposing on me.

Mr. WINDOM. I think my friend is imposing on the creditors of the Government by refusing.

Mr. SARGENT. I am informed by Senators around me that I had better proceed. I ask that the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate very long in a discussion of this bill. Perhaps it may be well for me to submit a few observations. Later in the debate, if debate shall occur, I may desire the opportunity to answer briefly such objections as may be made to the passage of the bill. But, knowing that it is near the close of the session and how precious time is, and that there is much business yet undisposed of, much of which ought to be considered, I will at least set the example on this measure of being brief.

This bill does not stand on the basis of ordinary legislation, and I commend that consideration to the careful attention of the Senate. Bills ordinarily coming to us from the House of Representatives stand simply upon their own merit or the merit of such recommendations as may accompany them. This bill is to carry out the provisions of a treaty which, by all the forms of law, has been negotiated and which already has been ratified by the Senate of the United States. This bill is to carry out the provisions of a treaty which involves now the rights and interests of a friendly power. That power, acting upon our initiative, or with our full concurrence, has legislated and adapted its business interests for the purpose of agreeing with the United States in the direction that this legislation shall enforce. All these sanctions are in favor of this legislation, and there ought to be grave reason at this stage to reject a bill like this. Senators who originally did not vote for the ratification of this treaty may well pause to consider whether there are not obligations springing out of the previous action of the Senate and the Executive resting upon them to give their vote now to enforce that former action.

I will not advert to the different stages through which this matter has passed. Hurriedly I alluded to them last night in the few remarks which I made in asking the attention of the Senate to the bill. I prefer to proceed to discuss briefly the reasons why the bill, if it stood simply in the place of the treaty originally ratified, ought to be adopted, why it is useful legislation, if that question is really before the Senate.

This treaty is valuable for commercial interests. It is valuable because it turns a balance of trade heretofore against us in our favor. It is valuable because, pro tanto, goods of our manufacture east of the Rocky Mountains, as well as west of the Rocky Mountains, will be taken in exchange for sugars and rice where heretofore the balance on this account has been compelled to be paid in gold. I do not know that I can present that consideration better—I will not take time to go over the statistics—than by a brief extract from a communication of the Secretary of the Treasury which has been submitted to the Senate. He said, under date of January 15, 1875:

> The conditions attending this commerce appear, however, to be such as render it of greater value to the United States, in proportion to its value, than is usual with countries similarly situated and producing sugar as the leading staple. So far as the exchange of articles is concerned, there is an equivalent to be found in our export trade for the value of the sugar and other articles imported. Such is not the case with most of the tropical islands or sugar-producing countries of either hemisphere. The import trade from the several possessions of the East Indies shows large aggregates received and very small values returned in the produce of the United States. The heavy adverse balance must be paid in coin. Thus the exports of United States produce and manufactures to China are but 5 per cent. of the imports from China, and the like exports to the British East Indies are but 1 per cent. of the imports therefrom. The exports to the Spanish East Indies, or Manila, are but ½ of 1 per cent. of the imports from those possessions, and, finally, the exports to the Dutch East Indies are but 4 per cent. of the imports from the same. The Hawaiian Islands take an aggregate value of American produce and manufacturers twice as great as do the last three countries or possessions taken together.

Certainly this is a trade valuable to ourselves in every respect, which ought to be promoted, and this treaty gives the opportunity to enhance these advantages. Accompanying this statement of the Secretary of the Treasury there is in a compact form for reference a table giving the values which he cites, and forcibly illustrating the deficiency of our export trade to the sugar-producing countries of the Pacific other than the Hawaiian Islands. Our shipping, our manufactures, our lumber-dealers, nearly all classes of business, are interested in the ratification of this treaty. It is a growing trade, growing in advantage to the United States.

I pass that, with this slight statement, which might be elaborated with much more force and perhaps with more clearness, to another consideration which is overshadowing, the political consideration in its broad sense, the consideration of the defense of our Pacific possessions, the consideration that in the Pacific Ocean there is an outpost in the shape of an inhabited group of islands, capable of great defense, of being made strong like Gibraltar, capable of great offense against our commerce in the Pacific waters, a base of supplies better than any of those that were used by the cruiser during the war of the rebellion under the countenance of England to prey upon our commerce, an outpost that, in the hands of an unfriendly power, would be a continual menace to the safety of our Pacific possessions, and could be used for the destruction of our commerce. Why, look at the map. These islands lie directly along the parallel between San Diego and China and Japan, on a line which runs straight on through New Orleans and Texas, a great route for commerce which is developing. It has been the anxiety of American statesmanship for years past, and of your business men, to increase and enhance our commerce in the Pacific. It is the only place where the American flag floats on great ocean steamships. It is the only great ocean where our commerce is not vexed by a competition that almost sends it from existence. There is an opportunity, by not allowing these islands to pass into the hands of a foreign, unfriendly nation—and any nation which is foreign may become unfriendly—from disturbing relations which are liable at any time to arise—there is an opportunity by retaining our influence over these islands to avert this result, and avoid disasters so serious which may happen in the future if we do not embrace this opportunity.

Daniel Webster once said when there was a proposition on the part of France to seize on these islands, he being at that time Secretary of State, that if that event occurred it would be the duty of the Government of the United States to use all the force of the American Government to prevent such an attempt from succeeding. American statesmen in times past, from Marcy down to the present time, have understood the value of this suggestion and have acted upon it. These islands are in a condition where they must soon fall to some power or other. Their population is rapidly decreasing, decreasing at such a rate as to be frightful. They will soon be a mere waif, to be seized by the strongest power or the power which shall have political influence over them. They prefer association with the Government of the United States. They see their inevitable doom although they now postpone it, and this treaty to a certain extent postpones it by keeping foreign nations from the trade of these islands. They prefer on account of the strong American influence in those islands that when they do fall they shall fall to the United States. When the Shenandoah was cruising in the Northern Pacific, destroying our whale fleet, destroying vessels by the score, burning them on the high seas, and when she could only be kept upon this mission of destruction by a supply of coal, the American citizens of Honolulu and those under their influence carried the coal that was available for that purpose five miles back in the interior where it could not be got and the Shenandoah went elsewhere at great distance for its coal. Suppose the Hawaiian Islands had at that time been in possession of the British government, which allowed Nassau and others of its possession to coal vessels on such missions, for which we righteously exacted from her a large indemnity in gold, would not then an opportunity, and a convenient one, have been given for this destructive cruiser to proceed on its work, which was interrupted and impeded by this incident? It is an illustration directly in point showing the importance, in a national point of view, that these islands shall not fall under the control of any government which may become unfriendly. Wars with England are not unknown to our history. They may occur at any time. Two great commercial nations like these, although there are so many reasons why they should not become embroiled, sometimes on a point of honor and sometimes on material interests, have misunderstandings, and almost before statesmen are aware of it a war is precipitated. So with France and so with Germany, which has grown so powerful during the last few years. All these nations are looking toward these islands.

The dominion of New South Wales is now seeking to make negotiations, as my telegrams from San Francisco and editorials in the papers there inform me, to take our place in this treaty. They want the commercial advantages of it and they want the influence which England would have, by means of such an arrangement, in getting final possession of the islands; and should we have any right to complain? For the third time these men have come to us and offered this alliance, offered us this power over their island. They came first when Marcy was Secretary of State; a treaty was negotiated under Pierce; but there were then some difficulties growing out of the annexation of Texas which prevented its consideration. Then again they came under Mr. Seward; a treaty was negotiated by him and recommended by him as Secretary of State. At that time there arose difficulties with reference to reconstruction and it passed over again; and now it is presented for the third time. If now, after having gone so far, after it has been sanctioned by the popular branch of Congress, after the ratifications have been exchanged between the two powers, after their parliament has adopted the necessary legislation to carry it into effect, we reject the needed legislation, have we any right to complain if they turn right around at once and make this arrangement with the other powers who are anxious for all this which we would throw away? I say that we should have no right; we should be foreclosed from taking the ground that Daniel Webster suggested should be taken, using the power of the Government to prevent a consummation like that, because we have thrown away our advantage, and what right have we to reconquer it by force of arms?

Mr. NORWOOD. Will the Senator from California allow me to interrupt him a moment? He is dealing in generalities and making general statements. I desire him to state whether there is anything in the treaty that gives the United States control of the Hawaiian Islands, by which it can acquire them, in the first place. If there is not, then I desire him in the second place to go a little more into detail and inform us what the reasons are, commercially, for the possession of these Islands if we ever get possession of them, and if we get possession of them how long it will take by the decrease of population, to which he has made reference, in which event the extinguishment of the race must take place before we can acquire possession. I desire——

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator has already asked more questions than I can remember.

Mr. NORWOOD. The first is whether the treaty provides that we shall have possession of these islands? If not, then I desire the country to know how much it is going to cost, commercially, before we can get possession of them and how long a time it will take before your possession——

Mr. SARGENT. I think I understand the Senator's questions. In the first place the treaty does not provide that we shall have possession of the islands.

Mr. NORWOOD. Now give us the details.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator need not catechise me. I will answer in my own way, and if he will have patience he can talk himself. I say the treaty does not provide for our having possession of these islands. I do not desire that the treaty shall so provide. I simply desire to strengthen American influence there. The Senator says I deal in generalities. I have not dealt in a single generality; I have stated specific facts, the utterances of statesmen; of the location of these islands and their importance, commercially, and on each point I have been careful to confine myself within matters that the ordinary intelligence of Senators makes them aware of.

Mr. NORWOOD. Now——

Mr. SARGENT. I have not answered your question yet.

Mr. NORWOOD. I was going to tell you what I meant.

Mr. SARGENT. I will listen to the Senator.

Mr. NORWOOD. As the Senator says he has not dealt in generalities, I desire to call his attention particularly to the specialties that I made reference to. If the treaty does not provide for our getting possession of these islands, then they must come in some other way. How is that? He says by the extinction of the race that now occupies the islands. I desire to know in the first place how long it will take that race to be extinguished, if he has made the calculation. If he has not, I can give him the information after awhile. Secondly, what is it going to cost this country commercially in the way of the loss of duties upon rice and sugar before we get possession of these islands?

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator will unquestionably make his speech before the debate closes; but it is not necessary for him to make it in mine. I cannot tell him whether we shall ever have to buy these islands or not. My idea is that our influence will be strengthened there, that we shall never have to pay one dollar, but they will fall naturally to us. That is what I expect. The rate of decrease of the natives is something like 2 per cent. per annum. The influence of the United States is strengthened by this treaty by these close relations, by the encouragement of Americans to go to the island and settle and enter into business there. It will be strengthening that influence now exercised by those who are there, and which is so great that on three occasions, although we have sent them away twice, they have come to the United States offering us these advantages, although tempting offers were made by foreign nations and there was no danger they would be sent away refused by either of the other great nations of the world.

Mr. INGALLS. May I ask a question? The Senator from California has stated that the native population was decreasing at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum. I ask him to inform the Senate whether the gross population is increasing or diminishing; and, if so, at what rate?

Mr. SARGENT. I think the gross population is decreasing somewhat on account of the rapid decrease of the native population. They have no home market; they have nothing now to call to them foreign blood, and Americans who go there are not much encouraged by the existing business.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator from California will allow me a moment, I will answer the Senator from Kansas that the total native population in 1832, when the first official census was taken, was 130,313. It has now dwindled down to 49,044, while the total population today, including not only natives, but all others, half-castes, Chinese, Americans, Hawaiians born of foreign parents, Britons, Portuguese, Germans, French, and other foreigners, numbers 56,897, a little over one-third what it was in 1832.

Mr. MORRILL. The whole population has diminished a thousand a year since 1866.

Mr. SARGENT. The effect of the treaty is to encourage Americans to go there to make it an American colony, and therefore it will cost us nothing to buy it by and by, because it will be in our possession as Texas was in our possession by the American population supplanting in influence and in numbers the Mexicans or Spaniards, by this infusion which follows the trade and inducements to go there, making it an American colony. I am now speaking of the probability of its falling, at the end of this treaty or at some future time, into the hands of another power than those who now possess it; and it is obvious that by strengthening our own influence there we do not need to provide, which we cannot now provide for, the annexation of these islands. I prefer and I believe the people of the Pacific coast and the country generally would prefer that this power should stand as long as it can; that it should not fall into our hands or go into the hands of any other power; but when it is absolutely necessary that we should take it, then it is requisite that we should be in a position to do so. Otherwise we have a menacing outpost to annoy our Pacific possessions, perhaps in the case of a terrible war to deprive us of them temporarily and to destroy our commerce from the seas.

These are reasons which must influence the minds of Senators from any part of the country, for I suppose we are not so bound up in sectional ideas that we can see nothing unless it is for the benefit of Georgia or Massachusetts or California. Show me that there is a necessity for some protection against a calamity of any kind properly cognizable by the Government of the United States in behalf of the State of Georgia, and because I am from California I will not object to that.

Mr. NORWOOD. That is what I will try to show you.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not believe that we ought to be governed by mere sectional considerations in matters of this kind; and it is as important to the glory of the country that the Pacific possessions should be saved as that the Gulf States should be saved. I trust that this measure will not be fought upon any sectional considerations.

Mr. NORWOOD. Not by me.

Mr. SARGENT. Now, Mr. President, I have talked longer than I intended to do in opening this debate. I have endeavored to present concisely the two main reasons why this treaty should be ratified, aside from such obligations of honor as may exist upon the Senate to ratify its own work, and I will leave to others to continue the debate, trusting, however, that the debate may not run an unreasonable length, but considering the near close of the session that we may come to a vote at an early hour.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I believe it is understood among the gentlemen who will take the adverse side to this proposition that I should ask the attention of the Senate now to what I wish to say in opposition to this legislation; and before I proceed in the line of argument I have marked out for myself, I may be pardoned if I make some brief allusion to the remarks and the arguments that have fallen from the Senator from California. This morning he takes a somewhat wider field than he assumed to occupy last night in a brief allusion to this subject, and although he says he has dealt in no generalities, such is not my opinion, and I have been a very attentive listener to his remarks. Last night in his earnestness and in his zeal in behalf of this measure he appealed as follows to the Senate:

> Now, Mr. President, I want to appeal to the generosity of the Senate on behalf of the people of the Pacific coast that this measure be acted on.

He deprecates sectionalism to-day, but he spoke in favor of a section, and that was his idea last night.

> I know the Senator from Louisiana is opposed to the bill. I know that he wants to debate it, and beat it if he can. That is fair warfare.

There is not a doubt in my mind but what the Senator in his zeal and in his propor regard for his obligations as a representative of the Pacific coast did desire on their behalf that this measure should be considered, but I tell him he is deluded. I shall try to convince him of the fact. I shall try to convince him that he has not spoken thus in the interest of the Pacific coast, but that he has been unwittingly led into a collusion existing between the sugar-planters of the Hawaiian Islands and the refiners of San Francisco, and I shall try to show him and I shall try to show the Senate that no possible advantage can redound to the commercial or the individual interests of the inhabitants of the Pacific coast.

Now, sir, speaking of the Senator's generalities let me call attention to the magnificence of his views of the grand expansion of the commerce of the country looking to a little miserable trade of 50,000 people, looking to the trade of a population scarcely more than one-third of that of the city of Washington, proposing to subsidize, proposing actually to give to a people scarcely more than one-third of the population of Washington an annual subsidy ranging from three-quarters of a million to three million dollars per annum.

Why, sir, but a day ago, within twenty-four hours, within sound of my voice here, some members of the Senate stood aghast at the proposition to contribute $500,000 to the population of Washington toward the expenses of its government when you own one-third of the property in the city. And now in looking after this miserable, this picayune trade—for there is no other word to express it—of this diminished and diminishing population of the Hawaiian Islands, you propose to contribute to their benefit an annual subsidy out of the coffers of the United States of $750,000, running perhaps up to $3,000,000, and not a farthing less than the lesser sum.

Let me ask the patient and earnest attention of Senators here. I state this conclusively, and I can demonstrate it, that if you carry out this treaty you will out-Herod every scheme of subsidy that the Congress of the United States has known for the last twenty years. Talk about your Pacific Mail; talk about your railroads to the Pacific, your Central and your Union Pacific; what were they in comparison with this? The whole people of the United States were benefited by them. They depleted the Treasury, I will admit, of certain amounts; but they cost nothing in comparison with this scheme. I ask Senators to mark well the whole enormity of this proposition to give to fifty thousand people, half savage, in the Hawaiian Islands three times as much per annum, and possibly six times as much, as you will contribute as your share to the support of the capital of the nation. I will refer now to a branch of the subject that comes uppermost in my mind at the moment in conjunction with the remarks that have been made by the Senator from California.

Before I proceed on my own line of argument I must answer one other proposition of the honorable Senator, that the Senate of the United States is bound in honor to carry out this treaty. In article 5 of the treaty it will be observed that an amendment in these words was ingrafted upon it, that this treaty shall not take effect "until a law to carry it into operation shall have been passed by the Congress of the United States of America." There was the distinct stipulation. Whether it induced Senators to vote for its ratification or not I cannot say; but there was the distinct stipulation that whatever proprieties or improprieties there might be in this measure we would have in the lapse of time, and during the recess of Congress, further opportunity to look into it, further opportunity to see its defects and to conclude for or against it as experience and observation might induce us.

Now, sir, I say earnestly to the Senate, and in no sectional spirit whatever, it is time for them to indulge in that "sober second thought" and see whether one branch of the treaty-making power of the Government has not made an egregious mistake that will come home to plague us during its duration. It is said that we sought this treaty. Did we not have the honor of entertaining His Majesty the King of the Sandwich Islands; and did we not do it at an expense of $50,000? Did we not pay his expenses to come here and make this treaty for himself? Have we not had the earnest and solicitous guardianship of "Hon. Elisha H. Allen, chief justice of the supreme court of the kingdom, member of the privy council of state, his majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States of America," a title that, coming off the stomach of a constituency of 50,000 people in those islands, almost takes one's breath away. But the honorable gentleman has been here; he has been extremely solicitous in this behalf. I take no exception to that; but I think that when the interests of 50,000 people here are represented by a gentleman bearing such high-sounding titles, it is quite as well that we should go under the surface of his titles and see what kind of a bottom he stands upon.

Mr. President, one word about this magnificent commerce of which we are in great danger of being deprived by the adverse interposition of some other power jealous of our supremacy. The data in regard to that commerce are profuse and voluminous, but a concise reference to them from official and authentic documents should serve to enlighten the Senate. I read from a statement furnished by the promoters, the abettors, the advocates of this measure, and therefore necessarily offering at least the most favorable presentation of the case:

> The total value of articles imported into Hawaiian Islands, included in the treaty of 1866, which are proposed to be admitted into the Hawaiian ports free of duty, amounted to $1,003,424.86, of which $483,711.76 came from the United States, and $519,713.10 came from other countries, but under such a treaty, with its advantages favoring American productions, most, if not all, would come from the United States.

There is the great bait that is held up to the Congress of the United States; a trade of half a million dollars per annum as a temptation for us to embark upon a scheme that is, as assumed, to be beneficial to us.

I know very well, Mr. President, that the argument will be instantly that if you make this treaty you will get more trade. Unfortunately it is a losing game from the start. The more trade you get the worse you are off. You cannot get more trade without more population, and you cannot get more population there without more goods coming to us free of duty. So we start with the proposition to-day that you pay them an annual subsidy, as I shall demonstrate in a very few moments, of $750,000 per annum to get half a million dollars' worth of trade, and the more trade you get the more subsidy you will have to pay. The whole trade to be gained is $519,000 per annum.

Mr. NORWOOD. I ask the Senator from Louisiana, if that is the total trade?

Mr. WEST. The gross trade, as I stated, is $1,003,000, omitting the odd hundreds, of which $483,000 came from the United States, and $519,000 came from other countries. But under this treaty we are to have this whole million; under this treaty we are to get this $519,000 that we do not get now, and I contend that we shall pay very dearly for it. In the views of the minority in House Report No. 116 this proposition is very concisely stated in these words:

> This is giving and remitting nearly one dollar of duty to the islands for the privilege of selling another dollar's worth of products.

And it is really "nearly one dollar," because, according to their report, the Secretary of the Treasury says the duties received on these articles are $456,777. But if there is not a mistake in the figures of the Treasury Department or the figures of the authorities of the Hawaiian Islands, there is a slip somewhere between the Pacific coast and the Hawaiian Islands of upward of 7,000,000 pounds of sugar per annum. The Hawaiian authorities give the amount of sugar sent to this country per annum at 25,000,000 pounds. The returns of the custom-house show that we received eighteen millions. There is the difference in the figures of the Treasury Department. I do not know where the deficiency occurs, or why it occurs, but I know that the official figures establish that fact, and I shall have occasion to allude to that in the course of my remarks when I come to the subject of the imminent danger of smuggling from those islands into the United States under the provisions of this treaty.

Now, Mr. President, can anybody advance one step beyond the proposition I have laid down, that we are searching and striving for the commerce of fifty thousand people? I shall speak as I proceed of what we have to pay for that commerce more at length; but is not that the proposition? Is not that what we desire to get? To the political advantages allusion will be made hereafter. But that is the commercial proposition. Let me repeat, if you enhance their demands and consumption, you enhance their products. If you pay more now for their trade than it is worth, the more you get the greater the disadvantage to the country.

One word in reference to the population of these islands. Although the Senator from California did not allude to it, I have heard it mentioned, and it is referred to in various official documents, that the industry and the production of these islands will be accelerated by the importation into its dominions of countless hordes of Chinamen. The Senator's philanthropy in favor of an oppressed race domestic to the soil to-day scarcely holds good with his protestations so elaborately, so eloquently, so feelingly made to the Senate on other occasions, when he deprecated the importation of a single cooly to the shores of the United States. But now, in order to promote the interests of this fifty thousand of a waning race, he is willing to seek for such political advantages through a treaty with the United States as will lead to an importation to those shores that will make those islands the home of slavery on the Pacific coast. Is that our policy? Does the Senator believe that we can Americanize them or attempt it by such a policy?

Mr. President, there have been three sources of information available to us, anxious inquirers for intelligence and knowledge, as to the true condition of the Sandwich Islands. One of these sources has been the book of Mr. Nordhoff, entitled Northern California, Oregon, and the Sandwich Islands, published in 1874. One other source of information is the Commercial Relations of the United States transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of State, and the third is the honorable and very much esteemed gentleman whom I had occasion to allude to in the opening part of my remarks. In whatever I said then I intended no personal reflection upon the gentleman. I have the highest esteem and regard for him; but I could not help thinking of the elaborate title with which he was clothed on behalf of such a very small constituency. In our references to that gentleman, in the efforts that members of this body, myself among the number, have made to obtain from him information as to the true condition of affairs in those islands, their capacity and their extent, I must say that we have not met with any very great success. Whether this is owing to the fact that the gentleman in his official capacity at home occupies the supreme bench of that somewhat limited kingdom and has not the opportunity of informing himself throughout as to the condition of affairs there, or whether it is owing to the fact that he has been, as I understand, mostly engaged in the last five years in very diligently prosecuting this measure before the Congress of the United States, I am not prepared to say; but it is unquestioned that if his information is not limited that our extracts from it have been of an exceedingly brief character.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest that the fault I think lay on the other side.

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator be kind enough to explain?

Mr. MITCHELL. We may not have been anxious to receive his instructions.

Mr. WEST. I will only say that there was a much greater anxiety to receive instruction than there was to impart it. It may be our capacity for receiving that instruction is not limited to the gentleman's qualifications for imparting it, but we certainly manifested more zeal to acquire than he did to impart, at all events.

I wish to lay down the details of the proposition to which I alluded at the outset, confining myself to one article of production of those islands, and leaving others to speak of and demonstrate what must result from other articles. From all the authorities we have we find that the sugar interest is the main producing interest of those islands. Mr. Nordhoff speaks of it; in the Commercial Relations it is alluded to; the total export of the islands to the United States of that article is given in the quarterly report of the Bureau of Statistics ending December 31, 1875, at 24,000,000 pounds. In the same book the aggregate export from the Hawaiian Islands is put down at 25,000,000 pounds, so that almost if not the entire quantity of the sugar of the Sandwich Islands comes to the United States.

A word as to the capacities of those islands; and on this subject I wish to dwell emphatically, I wish to cite from authorities, and I want to show to the Senate the exact information which we have upon the subject of the extension of the sugar culture within their limits. Mr. Nordhoff, first, in speaking of the fertility of the islands, on the subject of sugar culture says:

The common custom is to take off two crops and then let the field lie fallow for two years; but where they irrigate even this is not always done. There is no danger of frost, as in Louisiana, and cane is planted in some part of the islands in almost every month of the year. In Lahaina it matures in from fourteen to sixteen months; in some districts it requires eighteen months; and at greater altitudes even two years.

According to this much-respected authority, at the extreme limit and with the great stimulus that this premium upon production will give, within two years beyond doubt, without the slighest hesitation of belief, we will be importing fifty millions of pounds of sugar from the Sandwich Islands. There can be no question about that. Then, as to the area or further capacity of those islands. Were it to stop there the case would be bad enough.

Mr. Nordhoff further says:

There is room on the different islands for about seventy-five or eighty more plantations on the scale now common; and there are, I think, still excellent opportunities for making plantations.

When he wrote this work and gave his experiences to the public as a journalist and an author there were about twenty-five sugar plantations upon the island. He says there is room for about seventy-five or eighty more, so that beyond question within a brief space of time you will have a sugar product of those islands quadrupled to fourfold, producing now twenty-five millions, with a capacity according to Mr. Nordhoff of 100,000,000 pounds of sugar. Then with respect to the productive capacity per acre of these islands, the same authority says it is from two to two and a half tons per acre, attaining as high in some instances as six tons. Hon. Henry A. Peirce, United States commissioner to the Hawaiian Islands from the United States, under date of the legation of the United States of Ameirca, Honolulu, May 26, 1873, transmits his views on this subject as follows.

The list of articles exported and their value at three several periods, 1852, 1862, and 1872, exhibits the industries of the country. That of sugar is the principal one, the climate and soil being well adapted for the cultivation of sugar-cane.

Not more than one-fourth part of the area of land suited to its growth is under cultivation, owing to the scarcity or want of labor and capital.

Not of want of productive capacity but of labor or capital; and those are the elements, the lacking elements, that this treaty proposes to inject into the veins of this expiring community, a most praiseworthy object, a most commendable desire, but scarcely to be carried out at the expense and at the cost of the entire people of the United States. This gentleman at the same time, in transmitting his views to the Government of the United States, incloses also a summary of the area and cultivable capacity of the islands, vouching of course by its transmittal for its veracity; and I should like to refer to that in this connection. He says:

The area of the eight principal islands of the group is generally estimated at 6,000 square miles, or 3,840,000 acres. At least one-half of this is composed of the rocky and barren portions of the four lofty mountains of Hawaii and Maui. The remaining 1,920,000 acres are suited to grazing purposes. Not more than one-fourth of this is tillable soil, unless we include those portions of Hawaii where the pulu fern now grows, and which are adapted to the Manila-hemp banana.

THE SCHOOL AMENDMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, pursuant to the order of the Senate the joint resolution of the House of Representatives, as amended by the Senate, will now be read.

Mr. WEST. What becomes of me and the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is taken from the floor by one o'clock.

Mr. WEST. So I see.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will now be read by the Secretary.

Mr. DAVIS. Is this the third reading?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The third reading of the joint resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The third reading having been executed, according to order, the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution takes its place upon the Calendar. The regular order is now before the Senate, and the Chair replaces the Senator from Louisiana upon the floor.

Mr. WEST. Is there to be no further proceeding under the order of the Senate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have executed the order of the Senate and cannot do anything more until we take it up, which we shall try to do presently.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate insisted upon by the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. A. M. SCALES of North Carolina, and Mr. S. A. HURLBUT of Illinois managers at the conference on its part.

THE HAWAIIAN TREATY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, when interrupted I was saying something about the cultivable area of these islands. If the Senate will reflect a moment, this is a material consideration which should influence their action, because I shall endeavor to show as I proceed that we are absolutely buying this land—and getting no title to it—at over $5 an acre. What would be thought of the proposition if this bill came before the Senate headed, as it is in effect, "A bill to give the Sandwich Islands $3,000,000 per annum for a lease of sufferance for seven years?" How many Senators would vote for it? That is what it is in effect, and that is why I say it is the most gigantic and the most unwarrantable subsidy that was ever sought to be foisted upon the American Congress. Without going into the detail of these various islands, Kauai, Oahu, Maui, Hawaii, Moloki, Lanai, and others, which are used as sheep-runs, I will read further from the Commercial Relations:

This estimate, which is very low, gives a total of 292,000 acres of arable land in the group. Of this only a part is adapted to sugar-cane cultivation. In a communication published in the Advertiser in 1855 or 1856, Dr. R. W. Wood estimated the quantity of cane-land at 100,000 acres, which has generally been accepted as reliable. A recent writer in the same paper says: "The aggregate amount of the cane-land on these islands amounts to about one hundred and forty-five square miles, or 92,800 acres."

There are two authorities, both giving you 100,000 acres of land in the Sandwich Islands capable of successfully producing sugar. What does this other authority say? I have quoted Mr. Nordhoff on his average of two tons per acre. I have quoted him on his maximum of six, and now I will give the maximum of the honorable commissioner of the United States:

Two tons of sugar to the acre of cane.

This is not an extract from a newspaper; this is his official report:

Two tons of sugar to the acre of cane is the average crop of all the plantations. Captain James Makee, proprietor of Ulapalakua plantation, at an elevation of two thousand feet, on the southerly side of East Maui, once produced fifty tons of sugar from seven acres of cane.

Over seven tons per acre. That is the maximum of this authority. Let us take it at the average. One hundred thousand acres of sugar-land, four thousand pounds per acre, 400,000,000 pounds, is the capacity of these islands for sugar production, every pound of which will be produced and under this treaty will come to your shores. Twelve million dollars, according to the maximum of your authentic and official authorities, will be taken out of the Treasury of the United States annually to subsidize the sugar-planters in that island and such as may go there. But that I should not deal in too large figures, that I should not make my hypothesis unreasonable, let us come back to the present production there. Let us reason with ourselves how much it is likely to be on an average in the next seven years. I have shown you that the product to-day is 25,000,000 pounds. I have also quoted authorities showing that that quantity can be increased to the utmost capacity of the island within two years. I think it is within the bounds of reason to say that during the term of duration of this treaty the average import into the United States will be at least 100,000,000 of pounds per annum. Before I leave this authority let me call attention to one very significant note. It is prefixed with the usual notification, nota bene, and it should be a nota bene to the Senate:

N. B —The capital invested in thirty-two plantations amounts to a sum not less than $4,000,000, while their value at this time is not over $2,000,000.

Is not that an inducement, if there were no other, to have a minister plenipotentiary sent here to this Congress to endeavor to cajole this body into an arrangement that will put that deficiency of $2,000,000 back into the hands of the resident planters, irrespective of what is to be gained in the future? There is the authoritative admission that this property has decreased one-half; that it only represents 50 per cent. of what it cost; and can we form any other conclusion but that under the stimulus of this hot-bed process, fertilized by the treasure of the people of the United States, the value of these lands will soon be recovered to their proprietors?

I know such of those Senators who have given the slightest attention to my remarks are anxious to know how the money is to get out of the Treasury of the United States that I have stated. I have no doubt that they require that I shall make my proposition good that this is a gross subsidy, an unwarrantable subsidy, and that the carrying of it into effect must be done at the expense of the people of the United States. From page 472 of the Revised Statutes I read that in the introduction of sugar into the ports of the United States "sugar not above No. 7" shall pay 1¼ cents per pound;" and going on through the various grades I find that the extreme for unrefined sugars, the description embraced by the provisions of this treaty, is 3¼ cents per pound. A subsequent act of Congress enhanced this rate of duty 25 per cent., so such an addition is to be made to the figures named. How are the grades of sugar fixed under the laws and regulations of the Treasury of the United States? The saccharine properties of the import do not control the duty. It is a mere question of color. Make the sugar light in color and you raise the duty, although it may contain no more saccharine properties than if it was much darker. Consequently all sugar-importers intending to use sugar for refinement bring it in at as low a grade as possible, or as I am informed they practice sometimes the imposition of unnaturally coloring the sugar so as to get it in at a low price. I have been unable to ascertain from the Treasury Department what the exact amount of duty per pound is paid upon Sandwich Island sugar; but it cannot be doubted that the moment you put this premium upon its importation the grades of sugar will be raised by the sugar-producers there as high as possible, so as to get the advantage of the abatement of the highest rate of duty. They pay now, as well as I can understand, about 2¾ cents per pound; but not to be excessive in my limitation I will put the result of their efforts at 3 cents a pound duty. So then, when you take off the duty to-day, to get five hundred thousand dollars' worth of trade in gross, you will take out of the Treasury of the United States three quarters of a million dollars. To-day the imports into this country are 25,000,000 pounds of sugar. Abate the duty upon that at 3 cents a pound and you are giving a bonus to that people of $750,000 for the mere opportunity of getting half a million dollars' worth of their trade. What does half a million dollars' worth of trade amount to any way?

Take all the character and the experience of the trade with the Sandwich Islands, carried on mostly by the thrifty and provident residents of New England, and can you in the nature of things anticipate or expect that more than 20 per cent. inures to the parties engaged in it. Therefore, to get five hundred thousand dollars' worth of trade at a profit of 20 per cent., or $100,000 per annum, you begin by paying $750,000 out of the Treasury of the United States. There are three places for that advantage to go, beginning with the three-quarters of a million of abated duty at the very outset of the ratification and confirmation of this treaty. There are three places for that sum to go; first to the planters of the island; second, to the sugar refiners of San Francisco; or third, to the inhabitants of the Pacific coast, who consume every pound of it and more; but with regard to the latter that is a delusion. The Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] and my friend who sits beside me [Mr. MITCHELL] will find their people not benefited one farthing by this abolition of duty. Is it not within the experience of this Congress that when the duty upon tea and coffee was abolished it abated not one farthing of the cost of consumption to the poor man who drank either? Have we not had experience sufficient in taking off the duties of two important commodities to show that such a proceeding inures in no degree whatever to the benefit of the consumer?

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand that one of the principal reasons why the honorable Senator from Louisiana and other Senators from the South oppose this treaty and the bill is because in their judgment it will materially affect the sugar and rice interests of the South. If the gentleman's argument be true that the Pacific coast is not to be benefited in that there shall be no reduction in the price of sugar or of rice and the people of the Pacific coast are laboring under a delusion, then I should like to know how the sugar and rice interests of the South are to be affected by the treaty?

Mr. WEST. Whatever other Senators may have to say on the subject, the Senate will bear me witness that I have not alluded to the sugar interest of Louisiana one moment, and I do not intend to do so. I am speaking in no sectional interest at all. I am trying to demonstrate to the Senate that here is a scheme to take the money of the people from all sections and contribute it to the people of another section.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then one other question, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. WEST. One moment; I am not through with this one. I will answer the question further if the Senator will take his seat. I will now allude, although I did not so intend, to the interests of Louisiana in this matter. I know that this idea is not generally entertained by those whom I represent at home, but I say to them in all candor that I would prefer in their interest to give my vote for this treaty rather than to give it against it, and I will explain why. When you have depleted the Treasury of the United States to the extent of from three to twelve millions of dollars on the duty upon sugar, it is so much more argument in favor of the sugar interest of Louisiana that the present rate of duty upon sugar should be maintained. The time may come when the representative from the sugar-growing State of Louisiana will stand in this place and plead in behalf of that interest that you have stricken from your revenues millions of dollars per annum, and if you want to maintain those revenues at the present sum you must hold up the sugar-plantations of Louisiana or your Government will become deficient in its revenue. I know this idea is peculiar to myself, yet it is entertained by some others, too. It is not generally entertained by the people of Louisiana, but I should want no better vantage-ground, and the future representative of Louisiana in this body, whoever he may be, will want no better vantage-ground for the maintenance of the duty upon sugar in after years than to say, "You took it off of 400,000,000 pounds on the Pacific coast." That is the sectional allusion which I will make in regard to Louisiana sugar; but the Senator cannot put the words into my mouth that I am speaking in the interest of Louisiana alone. Now I will answer any other question the Senator from Oregon may put to me.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not wish to do that, I am very sure, but I simply want to understand the Senator; and I think I do understand him now. I understand him to state it as his judgment, in substance and effect, that the practical operation of this treaty will not affect the price of sugar and the sugar interest of the South. That is what I desire an answer to.

Mr. WEST. Very well. The Senator has made an answer for me. He started out with the proposition that I was opposing the passage of this treaty because it would damage the sugar interests of Louisiana. I do not do so from that stand-point.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not understand that the Senator from Louisiana, and certainly not after what he has said, takes that position; but I do understand him now to say that in his judgment the practical operation of this treaty will not or cannot in the very nature of things affect the sugar or rice interests of the South.

Mr. WEST. I should like to qualify that remark in one respect. Stimulate as you will under this treaty the production of those islands to the greatest extent, setting the example as you will by a reciprocity treaty in favor of one sugar-producing country, then you may ultimately injure our efforts; but the present and prospective scale of reduction, at the limitation I have put it, is so small in comparison with the consumption now and growth of this country that I do not regard it of importance. I will not make that same remark, however, with reference to the rice-growing interest of the South, because as I understand the rice produced in the Sandwich Islands assimilates more to the Carolina rice and the Louisiana product than any other species of rice known in the world. I have no doubt that my friend from Oregon could sit down and under some circumstances of his diet enjoy a plate of rice and milk with a great deal of gusto. If that rice were India rice, Patna rice, or China rice, he would have no relish for it; but if it were Sandwich Island rice or Carolina rice then he would enjoy it. Therefore there is another thing to be taken into consideration on the rice question, and my friends who are more concerned in the product of that article than I am myself will no doubt treat it properly and ably subsequently in this debate.

When my friend interrupted me I was making an allusion to the draught, the suction, if I may so call it, that will be applied to the Treasury of the United States by the abatement of this duty. I was going on to show what the rate of duty was and the process by which the rate of duty was defined under the regulations of the Treasury Department. This is all I have further in regard to that matter. I read from section 2914 of the Revised Statutes:

The standard by which the color and grades of sugar are to be regulated shall be selected and furnished to the collectors of such ports of entry as may be necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, and in such manner as he may deem expedient.

I called attention to the fact that the amount of duty that was paid respectively upon various grades of sugar was fixed and defined arbitrarily by the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury. Let any one of our friends here go into an appraiser's store in any custom-house of the Union where sugar is imported, and he will find a series of little glass bottles arranged, each one of those bottles graded according to color, marked by the authority, sanction, and direction of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States with the rate which sugar of that color shall pay. That bottle is laid down upon the importer's sample and the duty is fixed accordingly. There is an abatement of from 1¾ of a cent a pound up to 3½ cents, according to the grade of the sugar, and that grade is established by color. Does any man believe that it will not be instantly the interest of every sugar-producer in the Sandwich Islands, under this treaty and its stipulations, to so raise the color standard of his sugar that he will get the greatest benefit from the higher rate of duty? Then you cannot avoid in your own minds establishing 3 cents as an average rate of duty upon the product of sugar to be introduced from these islands.

Therefore, I repeat again, you begin by paying $750,000 a year. In less than two years you will pay a million and a half. Within the time of this treaty you will pay three millions a year; and it is within the bounds of possibility that your Treasury will annually be depleted by a maximum sum of $12,000,000. I do not think I overstate the case when I say that it will average $2,000,000 annually. So in the space of seven years, not to acquire the fee-simple of these lands, not to become the sovereign owner of this limited territory, but for the mere sake of creating an abstention on the part of other powers that they will not take possession of those islands you will have paid out of the Treasury of the United States, at the very lowest limit, $14,000,000, and you will have got what? A 20 per cent. profit on a trade of $500,000 a year. The proposition is absurd. Looked at in that light it cannot meet the sanction of this body.

Although I have not concluded what I have to say with regard to the commercial advantages claimed for this proposition, I shall now take occasion to speak of what are called its political advantages.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Senator comes to the political feature, I should like to make one other inquiry of him, and that is whether or not, in his judgment, the importation to the Hawaiian Islands from other countries outside of the United States would not in all probability come from the United States under the operation of this treaty, and therefore his argument of 20 per cent. of $500,000 would fall to the ground.

Mr. WEST. I have already shown that the trade of those islands from other parts outside of the United States is only half a million dollars. That is the very foreign trade the friends of this bill characterize as grand commercial advantages.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say that we shall get that trade under the operation of this treaty.

Mr. WEST. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Therefore the argument of the Senator that we are getting 20 per cent. on four or five hundred thousand dollars amounts to nothing, if I understood him?

Mr. WEST. I cannot conceive for my life how the Senator can come to any conclusion such as that. I have shown that the total trade of the islands is something over a million of dollars; that the United States have about half of it, and that under this treaty we shall get the other half. Is there anything more to get than the 20 per cent. on that other half?

Mr. MITCHELL. I confess if that is what the Senator means I did not understand him. We are now paying an ad valorem tariff to the Hawaiian Islands of 10 per cent. on all of the trade we have with them.

Mr. WEST. That there may be no mistake about this, as it is a material point in the line of my argument, I will go back and repeat it:

The total value of articles imported into the Hawaiian Islands, included in the treaty of 1866, which are proposed to be admitted into the Hawaiian ports free of duty, amounted to $1,003,424.86, of which $483,711.76 came from the United States, and $519,713.10 came from other countries; but under such a treaty, with its advantages favoring American productions, most, if not all, would come from the United States.

In other words, we are in pursuit, I repeat again, of this enormous deficiency of a trade of $500,000 a year, now unfortunately, to our detriment, enjoyed by other parties, and we propose for the profit on that half million to pay an annual bonus of $750,000.

Mr. MITCHELL. And we get to our people the reduction of the tariff they are paying to the Hawaiian government besides, the Senator will admit.

Mr. WEST. I never heard that the manufacturers of Great Britain were mulct in the duties imposed by the United States. It has always occurred to me as an element of political economy that the consumer was the unfortunate man that paid the tax. Now the Senator from Oregon says by taking off the Sandwich Islands' tariff the Pacific coast will get the benefit of that profit. That reasoning leads him exactly to my proposition that taking off the duty in either case only benefits the producer.

Sir, the magnificence with which this proposition is claimed as redounding to the eternal glory, the transcendental progress of the United States in a political sense, has amazed my comprehension. We are led to believe by the momently timerous Senator from California that the great coast of the Pacific, the home of a stalwart and warlike male population is open to the inroads of some hostile power and needs must that a gate-way be planted in the middle of the Pacific to stand watch and ward over their dangers. A historical reflection to the great Armada of Philip II in the sixteenth century, when the whole people in the kingdom of Queen Elizabeth were in dismay at the advent of that Armada is nothing in comparison with the Senator's apprehension. Twenty-seven thousand men under Philip II of Spain borne upon 75,000 tons of shipping were the dread and terror that overheld the British people.

One other armada, and that in the history of our own country, I will refer to. I allude to Sir Henry Clinton's invasion of Long Island in 1776 with another force of 27,000 men. A similar number of men to that of the great Armada was projected on our shores by what means? By the escort and protection of thirty-seven frigates of the line by the capacity in a carrying sense of four hundred transports. Take your own navigation laws where you have restricted the tonnage to your immigrant population to two tons per capita. Add to that the munitions of war, the cavalry, the artillery, wagons, the necessary three months' rations, the necessary one month's forage of the invading army to the Pacific coast, and you can double, ay, treble, your tonnage capacity. So to land on the shores of the Pacific from where? From a voyage of 16,000 miles such a force as could be presumed capable of invading its shores would require more shipping than the kingdom of Great Britain has to spare. Does any man believe, does the Senator from Oregon believe, that upon the bugle-blast of war being sounded on the Pacific coast 50,000 men would not spring to arms to resist an invasion of their territory in thirty days? Sir, where is your invading army? It fades like smoke before the breeze, as other invading armies have faded in history. It is an unwarranted and a discreditable apprehension to suppose that the soldiers of the Pacific coast are not adequate to take care of themselves in all emergencies against any invading foe. And how near are we to them? Let there be an untoward occurrence in your Indian warfare and the President of the United States and the General of your armies and the Secretary of War are overwhelmed with propositions of gallant and intrepid soldiers to enter into the service. Let there be the first intimation to-day that the Pacific coast is in danger, and although I know the men of that coast and know that they would consider themselves degraded if you supposed that they were unable to protect themselves, yet we could within a week re-enforce them beyond all possibility of disaster.

What becomes of this ghost of threatened invasion? I know there is a reference in one of these reports to a high authority in military circles stating as a strategical position the Hawaiian Islands would be of great advantage; but if you had asked that gallant soldier, "Do you propose that the people of the United States shall pay $2,000,000 for seven years to obtain that object?" he would tell you "I would rather have the money to put it in the mobilization of an army when danger was imminent." He was not dealing with dollars and cents as we are required to do as the guardians of the interest and the treasure of the people of the United States.

So I may ask in my humble way also to criticise a recommendation that has been made by a high naval authority on a somewhat similar subject. The instinct, the whole habit of thought of the Army and Navy of the United States tends to the aggregation of posts of strength, of offense and defense, leaving us to determine how they shall be regulated by the resources of the people. So here is another authority, Admiral Porter, not asked for his opinion as to whether it is advisable to pay this price to attain what he seems to have set his heart upon, but merely to express his opinion what an advantageous position this would be for an outlook on the Pacific. An outlook for what, Mr. President? An outlook overseeing the great commerce of the American people, a commerce by circumstances and by your improvident legislation that has dwindled down to such an insignificant extent that it occurs to me we had better address ourselves by some bounties in the interest of ship building to increase it instead of a bounty to protect it.

What does Great Britain want of these islands? They lie not within the track of the commerce from the Pacific coast to the Indies; in summer time they are eleven degrees and in winter time seven degrees south of the track of that commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL. What does England want with the Feejee Islands?

Mr. WEST. I am not discussing England.

Mr. MITCHELL. You asked what England wanted with the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. WEST. I will come to that. Impinging upon our very shores, on our frontiers, is a British possession known to us as Vancouver's Island, the stronghold and threatening outpost of the British government over our contiguity. Vancouver's Island lies in latitude 48° north; San Francisco lies in 37°. Every ship almost bound from San Francisco to the Indies takes the track that brings her nearer to this already established stronghold of the British government, supplied fully with coal and with a back population of loyal citizens besides, capable of producing and furnishing all the implements and necessaries of war, and it is proposed that England shall go out of her track, according to the theory of these gentlemen on political advantages, to get an island where the carriage of coal to a coaling station would amount to more than her armed tonnage afloat. There rests that British fleet, ready to pounce upon us at any moment in case of hostilities. So, if those hostilities are imminent or pending or probable, which I do not believe, Great Britain has no occasion for another station. But assuming the principle that there is danger in that proposition, how does this give us a foothold upon those islands, and how does it prevent Great Britain from wrestling with us when a casus belli occurs? Is there any proposition to fortify these islands, to take the money with which we subsidize them and make them a stronghold for the Navy of the United States, whence they can preserve a protecting scope over our commerce? Let war be declared by Great Britain with this country at any time during the existence of this treaty, and we must wrestle with her with the strong hand for the maintenance of our supremacy there. Not one atom have you advanced under your treaty to prevent it. Would it not, I ask, be a more sensible thing to step forward to this decaying and tottering kingdom and say, "We will give you so much per annum for so many years and we will own your islands, and we will go to a further expenditure and we will make, if necessary, such a stronghold as will be an essential and necessary and valuable protection to our commerce?" What will it protect, I respectfully ask of these naval authorities, by the mere ratification of this treaty? Will it raise a fortification? Will it plant a gun? Will it submerge a torpedo for the defense of your naval or your mercantile marine? No, sir; but you would find yourselves in the situation instantly of a war being precipitated upon you, of being compelled to meet the Queen of the Seas in your effort to make this locality formidable.

Does any Senator dispute my proposition that in a military sense the Pacific coast is absolutely impregnable? Does any Senator dispute my proposition that under this treaty you do not advance your naval protection one atom? I think not.

Mr. President, after all this is done; after all this annual subsidy has inured to the advantage of the interest that I have alluded to; after you have paid out of your Treasury your $2,000,000 per annum for seven years, where will we find ourselves at the end of that time? Have you advanced in any degree, even the most remote, toward bringing that people any nearer to you? Will not these men whom you pamper by your subsidy wax fat and grow strong in their conception of the value of their property? Can it be believed that at the end of that time these islands will be any more ready to drop like a ripe pear, according to the figure of speech of my honorable friend who sits near me, [Mr. HAMLIN,] into the lap of the great paternal Government of the United States than it is now?

Is it not the part of true political wisdom to so adapt your negotiations that you will understand absolutely what is the quid pro quo for the outgo from your Treasury? Further light has come to this body during the period that this treaty has remained incomplete. We are obliged to ransack the meager authorities that are attainable to ascertain something about these islands. A commissioner from that government comes here and endeavors to promote this treaty; but where is the observant and intelligent scrutinizer on behalf of the American people that has been to these islands and examined the question in the light of finance and commercial advantages and the reverse, who tells you it is to your interest to ratify this measure? What harm can be done by the lapse of a few months with the further opportunity that the authorities of the United States and the members of Congress will have to examine and to scrutinize and to reflect upon this matter? What harm will be done by letting this bill now before us lie dormant until we shall come here in the winter better informed on the subject? Is it not the duty of the President of the United States, after such preparations and examinations as are now made to further investigate this proposition and to ascertain what are its elements, and what are its damages and its detriments, as well as its assumed advantages?

I can understand why it is pressed with such unexampled zeal in this body. It finds its earnest advocates among the representatives of that coast which can only see advantage and profit to their section in it. It finds further advocates and supporters in the friends of the Administration, who would dislike to reject any measure that meets the encouragement and the support of the Chief Executive. Sir, I say that the friends of this Administration, I say that the friends of the republican party in this Chamber should beware how they fasten upon the civil administration of this country a measure that will come home to plague them, and that cannot be supported and sustained before the American people under the light of inevitable experience. I say to Senators here and I say to my fellows on this side of the Chamber that there is danger in this thing; that it means the grossest, the baldest, the most extravagant subsidy in behalf of a peculiar and special interest that ever was passed by the Congress of the United States; that the commercial advantages are insignificant; that you are asked to give from a million and a half dollars to $3,000,000 to a foreign people scarcely numbering more than one-third of the population of this city, when you hesitate and you cavil and you demur at an annual appropriation of half a million to maintain a decent government in a city where you own one-third of the property.

Mr. President, I call upon the Senate to pause before it takes this unfortunate step. If the propositions that I have laid down can be controverted, I shall be most happy; but I tell you you are ingrafting on your legislation now a scheme more reprehensible in its nature, in its effects, and in its results, than clouds the legislative history of your country for the past twenty years. Pause, I say to you; stop now and give us further opportunity to look into this scheme. What will be the great disadvantage or detriment if you have a few months more to dissipate the ideas that some of us have in regard to it and let some intelligent emissary of the United States go there and propound the question on our behalf whether it is policy to pay $3,000,000 a year for a lease of the islands, and such a lease! A lease out of which you will get no benefit, a lease through which you will make the lessee wax fat and strong and more able to resist your advances.

I recognize the importance of making these islands an inherent part of our republic. I understand that, and I say that in my opinion now is the right time to strike, now is the fit time when, trembling in the balance they see their sovereignty about to depart from them, we can, with less money than is required to be granted to them as a subsidy, buy the islands out and out, and be the undisputed sovereign of the country.

Mr. President, I speak with earnestness. I am so impressed with the fallacy, the danger, the wrong of this measure that I ask, at least, that further consideration should be given to it. The political advantages are as naught; the commercial advantages are a delusion and a snare. The honor of the United States is more bound to its people than it is to this foreign population. We are more bound in honor to our own people to recede from what we are doing, if we are doing wrong, than we are bound to adhere to any foreign people to the detriment of our own.

Mr. President, I will not occupy the time of the Senate further. There will be further debate on this subject, and to other Senators have been instrusted other interests that will be affected by the ratification of this measure. I am sorry to see, not speaking personally at all, the lack of interest that the Senate manifests on a subject of such very great importance. I trust, before final action on the subject, that the Senate will at least arouse itself from its lethargy and understand what interests of magnitude and importance are at stake in the question. Just so sure as we consummate this treaty, in my judgment, we lose the Sandwich Islands forever. We shall be fourteen to twenty millions of dollars worse off at the end of seven years than we are to-day, and we shall have to begin de novo. Take their own admissions. Now is their very strait. Now is the hour of their distress. If we want to go to their relief, bring them by purchase under the fostering dominion of this Government, and ingraft your institutions upon them, and at least give the people of the United States some return for their money that you take away from them by this measure.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the remarks I may have to submit to the Senate on this Hawaiian treaty have perhaps rather an indirect application, but as this is about the only opportunity I shall have, I will now submit them.

I will say before I begin that I have several tables to present with annotations showing the character of the reductions made by the House of Representatives in the appropriation bills, and I now ask the consent of the Senate that these tables may be printed without reading. It will occupy a good deal of time if I am required to read them.

Mr. NORWOOD. I dislike to object, but I must object to their being printed. I prefer to have them read.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask whether it is in order to move that permission be granted to publish them. I will say to the Senator that I do not propose to be prevented from reading them, and if I am compelled to read them, it may take me till about six o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EATON in the chair.) Does the Senator from Georgia insist on his objection?

Mr. NORWOOD. I do, sir.

Mr. WINDOM. I move, then, if it be in order, that I be permitted to publish the tables, annotated as I have stated, without reading them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia objects to the printing and demands the reading. The Senator from Minnesota moves that he be allowed the privilege of printing——

Mr. WINDOM. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not familiar with the rule that obtains in the Senate, but in other legislative bodies it would be for the decision of the body. The Chair, unless there be objection, will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

The question being put, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I am much obliged to the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Before the Senator proceeds I should like to make an inquiry of him. It is very evident that it will not be a great while before there will not be a quorum in the Senate Chamber. I understand that there are several conference reports that might be submitted and acted upon. I want to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota whether there are not some conference reports which might be presented.

Mr. WINDOM. The remarks which I shall make now after the Senate has consented that I may publish the tables will not take, I think, more than an hour, and probably not that long, and there will be no conference reports ready to act upon in that time. I have chosen this opportunity so as not to delay the action of the Senate on the conference committee reports. I would otherwise have preferred to make my remarks in submitting one of the reports of those committees.

Mr. DAVIS. I take it that the Senator from Minnesota will refer to the tables that he wishes to have printed.

Mr. WINDOM. I will state what they are; and now I will say that having prepared my remarks so that I might not take too much time of the Senate, I shall decline to be interrupted until I conclude them, and I will say to Senators who may have any doubts as to the truthfulness or propriety of what I may say, that if they will make a little note I shall very gladly submit myself to cross-examination when I have concluded, but not before.

Mr. BOUTWELL. When the examination-in-chief is over.

Mr. WINDOM. Yes, when the examination-in-chief is over, as suggested by my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, my object in asking the indulgence of the Senate at this time is to correct a grossly erroneous and exaggerated statement which has been frequently paraded on this floor and elsewhere. The statement to which I refer has been embodied in tabular form, and is doubtless designed for use as one of the chief weapons of aggressive warfare in the presidential contest. My purpose is to demonstrate as clearly as I can its fallacy and falsity, so that no one shall hereafter employ it without knowing that his weapon isfalsehood.

I will present the table referred to, so far as it relates to the appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1876 and 1877, and the reductions which are alleged to have been made by the House of Representatives.

Statement as published in House of Representatives showing alleged reductions in the appropriations made by the House bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, from the appropriations made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867.

Gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol flaunt these figures in our faces and triumphantly exclaim, "Here stands the bold, defiant proposition that neither logic nor arithmetic can answer, that a democratic House have reduced the ordinary expenses of the Government over $39,421,961 below the appropriations for last year by the republican House of Representatives for the very same service."

The honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] who has recently won so brilliant a reputation for statistical accuracy, takes up the refrain, and, with expression of supreme satisfaction so peculiar to himself when dealing with figures, calls our attention to the statement as a conclusive demonstration of republican extravagance and democratic economy. Speaking of the House of Representatives he says:

> And they have cut down the appropriations from last year $38,000,000 in round numbers. Now I ask, if this is true, if the public expenditures the current year may be reduced $38,000,000, why might not that sum have been saved last year and for several years past? Let him who can answer.

Mr. President, this is the modest pretension daily dinned into our ears from the other end of the Capitol and from certain Senators in this Chamber. It will be repeated with glaring head-lines in every democratic newspaper and thundered from every democratic platform until the end of the presidential campaign. I have therefore thought it worth while, in the interest of truth, to examine this very extraordinary assumption in order to ascertain if it has any foundation in fact.

And I am compelled to say that not only arithmetic and logic but truth itself are all set at defiance by the statement that $39,000,000 or anything like that sum has been saved by democratic "economy." In stating the result of my examination of this question I shall show, first, that the table exhibiting the pretended "saving" of $38,516,312.09 involves several important omissions and errors, which when corrected leaves the amount only $30,076,241.63; second, that the principles and expedients adopted to effect this large reduction are, as to all their essential features, in the face of reason, justice, and expediency; and that they were made wholly in the interest of party, and without reference to the necessities of the public service or the best interests of the country.

ERRORS CORRECTED.

The errors and omissions by which the above table is made to state a false balance against the appropriations for 1876, larger $8,440,070.46 than actually exists, are—

First. In introducing into the statement the deficiency bill, which has not the slightest bearing upon the comparative economy of the two Congresses. The deficiency bill passed by the last Congress was for the year 1875 and prior years, and the bill passed by the present House of Representatives was almost entirely for years prior to 1876, and chiefly for years prior to 1873. The statements in the table that $4,703,699.18 was an appropriation for the year ending June 30, 1876, and that the sum of $671,486.74 was for the year ending June 30, 1877, are wholly untrue. Neither of these appropriations has any more to do with the expenditures of the years 1876 or 1877 than with the cost of the pyramids. The amount credited to democratic economy by this error, not to characterize it by any harsher term, is $4,032,212.44.

Second. In omitting to charge against the House appropriations the sum of $1,500,000 for the centennial exposition. The sum of $505,000 appropriated by last Congress for that purpose is charged against the appropriations for 1876, but the amount appropriated for same purpose by the present House of Representatives is wholly omitted in their table. Therefore the additional sum of $1,500,000 must be charged to House bills for the year 1877.

Third. Omitting to charge against House appropriations for 1877 the sum of $1,807,858.02 "unexpended balances" which would have been covered into the Treasury, had they not been made alive again by the House bills. To appropriate money without naming the amount is bad legislation, and for several years has been discountenanced by both Houses. This year the committee of the House dug up all the old "unexpended balances" they could find and re-appropriated them, without naming the amounts thus appropriated. Hence the sums charged in the table against the year 1877 in second column are less than were really appropriated by the sum of $1,807,858.02, which should be added to them.

Fourth. There are other errors in the table in not charging up to the appropriations for 1877 the sum of $200,000 for forts on the Yellowstone, $200,000 for the Washington Monument, an indefinite appropriation, amounting to about $500,000, for mints and assay offices, and the sum of $200,000 for paving Pennsylvania avenue. The amounts appropriated last year for purchasing site for a fort in Texas and for a monument to Farragut were all duly charged to the last Congress. Why should not amounts for similar purposes be charged to the present Congress?

The aggregate of these corrections amounts to $8,440,070.46, which, being deducted from the vaunted $38,516,312.09, leaves the actual reduction only $30,076,241.63.

I will not now stop to characterize, as I might very properly, a statement so grossly inaccurate; for whether the errors be intentional or not, they are of small moment in comparison with the dereliction of duty and the partisan recklessness which mark many of the reductions actually made. I content myself with presenting a corrected table showing the actual reductions.

Net reduction of House bills	29,594,187 38	.....

If it were desirable to show the actual reductions proposed by the House bills below the actual expenditures of the last fiscal year—perhaps a more precise mode of stating this proposed retrenchment—the fact might be mentioned that in addition to the unexpended balances reappropriated by the House there were other unexpended balances amounting to about $2,500,000. Subtracting this amount from last year's appropriations, and also from the above stated reduction, we find the actual retrenchment proposed to be $27,576,241.63. But as the comparisons have all been made between last year's appropriations and the amount of the House bills for the current fiscal year, I shall in my remarks adhere to that comparison.

It will be observed that the net reductions for the current year as stated in this table amount to the sum of $29,594,187.38, whereas by the table prepared at the House of Representatives, after the proper corrections for the errors referred to have been made, the reduction amounts to $30,076,241.63, a difference in the results amounting to $482,054.25. This discrepancy in the results is due to differences arising in the course of computations involving hundreds of items, in the aggregate amounting to over $300,000,000. This difference for the practical purpose which I now have in view may be disregarded. I will only add in this connection that table B and the other tables which I present have been prepared with a great deal of care, and I believe them to be correct.

REDUCTION ANALYZED.

I propose now to analyze this "reduction," and to demonstrate that while a small portion is a proper saving of money, it is on the whole, and with respect to the purposes for which it was made and the impression it was designed to create, a sham and delusion, a thinly disguised attempt to obtain votes under false pretenses.

The purposes in view were to prove the republican administration guilty of extravagance by showing how much less a democratic House could appropriate. The impression designed to be produced was that these "reductions" are a real "saving" of money to the Treasury. I propose to show that reduction in appropriations does not always mean economy, and that in the case under consideration but a very small part of the boasted retrenchment can by any possibility be called a saving.

The character of these reductions will appear in the following table, which has been prepared as a general summary of the tables which will be appended to my remarks:

Statement showing the character of the reductions constituting the difference between the amount of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and the amount provided by the House bills for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

CHARACTER OF THE PRETENDED ECONOMY.

I will explain more fully these characteristics of the several reductions mentioned in the last table, and if I am not greatly mistaken they will illustrate the fact that a mere "reduction" in appropriations does not always mean a "saving," and that while the appropriation bills of this year as passed by the House of Representatives are in the aggregate $29,594,187.38 less than for the same branches of the service last year, the actual "saving" to the Treasury is not one-fifth of that sum. They will also show that the blind and reckless manner in which the public service has been maimed and mangled may result in losses and damage to the public interest much greater than the real saving. The true character of these reductions will be best appreciated by closely observing the means by which they are effected.

EXPEDIENTS RESORTED TO BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Some of the expedients employed to accomplish the boasted reduction are embraced under the following heads, viz:

1. POSTPONEMENT UNTIL NEXT YEAR OF VARIOUS NECESSARY AMOUNTS, SUCH AS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND OTHER WORKS OF IMPORTANCE: AMOUNT, $5,086,791.82.

For public buildings under the Treasury Department the House bills appropriated $2,645,160 less than was appropriated last year, and this sum enters into the grand total as a saving. Is it anything more than a mere postponement? The buildings are needed. They are now under process of construction. In some cases, notably that of the Chicago custom-house and post-office, there is no money to roof them, and serious loss will be incurred. It is true that at Chicago there is an unexpended balance, but I am credibly informed it is not available for roofing the building. In other cases foundations are begun, but there is not money enough to bring them up to the level with the streets so that the grading may be done and the gas and water pipes be put in order.

The amount appropriated by the House bill is not large enough to continue these works economically, and hence money will be wasted instead of saved. The Government is paying large sums for rent of buildings in various places, which might be saved by the completion of those now in progress. There will be money enough in the Treasury this year to prosecute these works with reasonable vigor and economy, and the only question is, shall it be applied to proper works of public improvement or used in reducing the national debt?

Labor and material are cheaper than they have been for many years, and it is to be hoped cheaper than they will be in the years to come. Is it not true economy for the Government to avail itself of these advantages? There is also, as we are aware, a great demand for employment and much distress in the country by reason of the suspension of private enterprises. Is it a wise or even a humane policy for the Government to suspend also, and thereby increase the public distress? Should not the Government show itself superior to panics, and by a firm, courageous, and judicious policy encourage the people and aid in the restoration of public confidence and prosperity? What is the effect in our cities when the Government suspends its works and dismisses its employés? In the first place, it is to increase cruelly and unnecessarily the number of unemployed people, and hence to aggravate the general distress. In the second place, it is to intensify the public distrust by advertising to every body who looks upon these deserted works, that the nation itself is in failing circumstances.

No, Mr. President, this is not "economy!" It is not a "saving" of public money! It is at best but a mere postponement, which may serve a political purpose by reducing for this year the aggregate of appropriation bills; but it is not statesmanship.

For light-houses, beacons, and signals the apparent "saving" is $585,200. These are all required for the safety of our commerce on the ocean and the great lakes. They were estimated for and urged by the Light-House Board. No person doubts their value or that they will be provided for hereafter. This alleged "saving" is therefore only a postponement, probably at the cost of life and property to American citizens engaged in commerce. The wants of commerce were of less importance, however, in the estimation of the House of Representatives than the political ends that were to be subserved by a spurious economy. A large reduction must be made at all hazards, and commerce must wait until after the election.

For surveys of the public lands the amount of "saving" is put down at $647,390. Of course these lands are to be surveyed in the near future. To refuse to do so now is rank injustice to the new States and to the hardy pioneers who are pushing the van of civilization into the wilderness. The amount which should have been appropriated is merely postponed until next year.

The character of the other items postponed, amounting with those already named to $5,085,791.02, will be seen by reference to the following table, and more particularly by referring to the detailed statement which is appended to my remarks. To call any portion of this an actual saving of money to the Treasury is simply absurd:

2. BY WITHHOLDING APPROPRIATIONS AT THIS SESSION TO BE SUPPLIED BY DEFICIENCIES AT NEXT SESSION OF CONGRESS: AMOUNT, $7,697,483.96.

The House bills appear to have been framed for the express purpose of creating deficiencies. The object to be gained by this expedient is obvious. It will make a flattering exhibit of the economy of this Congress in comparison with the last, and if large sums withheld can be appropriated next winter the presidential election will then have passed, and the majority in the House of Representatives will have had the benefit of pretended economy during the canvass. It does not comport with common honesty to assert that such "reductions" are in any sense a "saving," or to employ such an expedient to show that this Congress is more economical than the last. The true measure of this alleged retrenchment cannot be taken until the next session shall have expired and the large deficiencies which must be provided shall be known.

To illustrate, take the matter of public printing, for which there was appropriated last year $1,665,507.66, and by the House bill only $1,134,105.50. It is well known that there was no considerable "unexpended balance" at the end of last year; it is equally well known that the cost of the printing for the current year which has been and will be ordered by Congress will be in excess of last year. The numerous investigating committees of the House which have been in session for the last six months, ransacking jails, penitentiaries, and lunatic asylums, and delving into the slums and sewers of society in search of evidence against republican officials, will all want their evidence and reports printed. That alone will immensely increase the expenditure for public printing. And yet in the face of these facts the House bills appropriate $531,402.16 less than was found necessary last year. This too is called a "saving," and constitutes a part of the grand aggregate.

The folly and demagogism of this reduction are proven by the fact that before the present session could adjourn we were compelled to vote a "deficiency" of over $100,000 for printing Agricultural Reports, the amount allowed by the House bills for congressional work having been substantially exhausted in the second month of the fiscal year.

For "mints and assay offices" the reduction from last year's appropriations is $410,035, and this in view of the very largely increased service that will be demanded of the mints by reason of the laws requiring additional silver coinage. It must have been intended either that the law shall not be complied with or that a large deficiency shall be provided when Congress shall meet next winter. At least $200,000 more will be required this year than last. The reduction upon this item proves conclusively that not economy but small appropriations was the design of the House bills. Every piece of silver or nickel coined at the mints yields a large percentage of profit to the Government, and hence the more business we can do the greater will be the profit to the Treasury. Withholding the sums necessary, as the House bills have done, is to curtail the operations of the Government in a profitable business, and thereby work an actual loss to the Treasury.

For "judiciary expenses" the reduction is $516,200. This was done in face of the fact that a deficiency of $100,000 for last year is required. There is no reason to suppose that a less sum will suffice this year, and hence a deficiency bill of from five to six hundred thousand will be voted next winter. Here is another half million which goes to the credit of democratic economy, which should rather be credited to an artful dodge or a false pretense.

In the Army bill alone the reductions would have created "deficiencies" of over $5,000,000, even under the circumstances which existed last year. To make such reductions in the face of a threatened general Indian war is wholly inexcusable. To thus expose the frontier to the merciless savage for the sake of making political capital can hardly be pardoned, even on the ground of partisan extremity. The House of Representatives has already conceded in conference that a large portion of this reduction was inexpedient. And before the close of the session we will be compelled to vote several millions for a deficiency, which it was expected could be deferred until after the election. In this case, as in that of public printing, the cloven foot could not be concealed, even for sixty days of the fiscal year.

For pay and provisions of the Navy, which are fixed by law, and the sums required, the subject of almost exact calculations, the amounts withheld for deficiencies aggregate $814,000.

But I must not stop to enumerate all the items of this character, amounting in the aggregate to $7,697,483.96. They run through all the bills, and are so numerous as to justify the conclusion that if those bills were framed upon any principle at all it was upon the principle of dodging responsibility at this session by providing for large deficiencies at the next. By this expedient it was not difficult to make a flattering exhibit of "economy" in comparison with the bills of last year, which honestly appropriated the amounts required for the public service. I submit a table showing the reductions which will have to be made up by deficiencies next winter:

Statement showing the amounts withheld from the appropriation bills passed by the House of Representatives, but which must be provided for in deficiency bills at next session of Congress.

3. TOTAL OR PARTIAL FAILURE TO PROVIDE FOR IMPORTANT BRANCHES OF THE PUBLIC SERVICE: AMOUNT, $6,239,577.30.

The notable omissions of this character are the total failure to provide for the Indian Bureau, the Bureau of Military Justice, the Office of the Signal Service, and many other branches of a less important character. The amount of pretended savings by these total omissions to provide for the service is about $300,000. Such economy is quite too modest. Why not save the entire expenditure by omitting all appropriations? The principle would not be different, and by that means an astounding economy of a hundred millions might be shown. Such an exhibition of democratic frugality might be expected to take the country by storm next November.

Let me very briefly mention a few of the more important branches of the public service that have been crippled by this expedient.

Inland mail transportation shows an apparent saving as against the appropriations of 1876 of $1,948,000. As compared with the actual expenditures of last year this is not even a reduction, for the amount expended under this head was $91,302 less than the sum appropriated by House bill this year. The amount appropriated by the House would have been enough for the service which was required last year, but will not meet the increased demands of the service. The consequence of the failure to make sufficient provision is already seen in the stoppage of the fast-mail trains, and will be further apparent before the close of the year, either in a further curtailment of service or in a deficiency bill at next session. As against the expenditures of 1876 not a dollar of this large sum can be credited to democratic economy.

In the consular and diplomatic bill we have reductions, arising from failure to provide for the service, amounting to $274,100. Nearly the whole of this reduction is due to the curtailment of our foreign service or to the reduction of salaries already below those of many of the weakest nations. Cutting down the salaries of our foreign representatives, who are now unable in many cases to live respectably at the courts to which they are accredited, is simply a national disgrace. Withdrawing representatives from other countries with whom we have important and growing commercial relations is an act of folly, and yet by both of these means a considerable "saving" has been effected by the House of Representatives.

In the revenue-cutter service an apparent saving of $280,231.21 was made, partly by appropriating an unexpended balance and partly by failing to make the necessary appropriations. This service is the right arm of the Treasury Department in the collection of customs. To cripple it as proposed by the House bill is to incur the risk of losing thousands of dollars for every dollar saved.

The same remark may be made with reference to the item for collecting internal revenue, in which a reduction was made below the imperative demands of the service amounting to $836,340. Had not the Senate insisted upon an increase of the House appropriations, I have the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for saying that the loss of revenue resulting from inadequate provisions for its collection would have amounted to very many times the pretended saving.

The items of reduction under this head are so numerous I must content myself with naming only one more, which though small in amount illustrates better than any other the animus of the House bills and the spurious character of the whole pretension of economy. Though the amount saved is only $6,000 it may result in losses to the Treasury which can only be measured by millions. I refer to the refusal of the House to appropriate anything for the examination of rebel archives.

The Treasury and War Departments are in possession of immense quantities of papers taken from the southern confederacy which furnish the only evidence available to the Government to defend against the myriads of claims which are pressing from all quarters. By the annual appropriation of small sums of money competent clerks have been kept constantly employed in the examination of these "archives" and "records" in order to furnish evidence to the committees of Congress, the Court of Claims, and the Secretary of the Treasury. The evidence furnished from these sources has already saved the Treasury millions of dollars.

A letter from Adjutant-General Townsend addressed to myself under date July 26, 1876, says:

> The use to which these records have been put is chiefly in the furnishing of evidence to the courts and claims commissions. In this work several millions of dollars have been saved to the Government, two claims having been defeated amounting to $700,000 and $550,000 respectively. There are now pending before the southern claims commission nearly if not quite 10,000 claims. Against many of these evidence has been furnished, and the commissioners are constantly sending for original papers. Much more evidence can be furnished this commission.

The House bills wholly omit the means of searching these archives in the Treasury Department, and for those in the War Department they make such inadequate provision that General Townsend would regard the work as substantially suspended.

In addition to the 10,000 claims now pending before the southern claims commission, as stated by General Townsend, there are suits pending in the Court of Claims for captured and abandoned property, chiefly cotton, amounting to $10,829,000. The pigeon-holes of almost every member of Congress from the South are overflowing with claims of all kinds growing out of the war. The committee-rooms of both Houses of Congress are burdened with them. It may be said without much exaggeration that the claims ready to pour in like a flood upon Congress so soon as the gates are opened exceed the total of our national debt. The Treasury Department is in a stage of chronic siege by the army of claim agents which swarm about the national capital. At the doors of the southern claims commission, in the Court of Claims, in the Treasury Department, in the corridors and lobbies of both Houses of Congress, this army stands ready to prey upon and plunder the Treasury the moment the barriers which now restrain them are broken down. Can it be possible that in the sacred name of economy and reform these appropriations are withheld for the purpose of closing the chief sources of evidence against them, and thereby throwing open the vaults of the Treasury to unrestrained pillage? Can it be that the men whose tables groan under these claims have deliberately chosen this method of sapping and mining the strongest defenses of the Treasury?

The amount "saved" by this reduction is so small in comparison with the magnitude of the dangers incurred, that a very great stretch of credulity is required to name the act economy.

The other items for which inadequate appropriations have been made or from which they have been wholly withheld will be seen in the following table:

4. THE RE-APPROPRIATION BY HOUSE BILLS OF UNEXPENDED BALANCES REMAINING FROM APPROPRIATIONS OF FORMER YEARS WITHOUT NAMING AMOUNTS: AMOUNT, $1,807,858.02.

By honest and economical management republican officials had saved from the appropriations for former years some four and a half million dollars. This afforded a fine field for manipulation of figures by the new economists. The law has for several years required that all such balances shall be covered into the Treasury, so that the sums actually appropriated would honestly appear on the face of the bills. The practice of appropriating indefinite or unknown sums has long been justly regarded as vicious legislation. But to name the sums would be to swell the amounts for this year and to proportionately diminish the vaunted total reduction which had been promised. There was another advantage in not naming the amounts of these large unexpended balances, namely, whenever they remain over from last year, every dollar thus re-appropriated counts for two in the aggregate reduction as against the actual expenditures of that year. For instance, assume that for a given service $800,000 were appropriated for 1876, and by economy and good management, or a change in the service, only $600,000 were expended, leaving an unexpended balance of $200,000. The House could appropriate $400,000 and the unexpended balance. This would make $600,000 available for 1877, precisely the amount expended in 1876, and yet the amount of such balance not being named, there would appear to be a difference in favor of this year amounting to $400,000. These sums thus manipulated all go to swell the magnificent aggregate of democratic economy and retrenchment.

Thus by the cunning practices of these reformers the very economy of republican officials by which these large sums were saved is made to count against the party as extravagance. The large apparent reductions thus effected are in no sense a saving. They are not even actual reductions, and yet they count as such in the fallacious table on which I am commenting. To count them either as reductions or savings in comparing the relative economy of the last and the present Congress is simply a fraud.

5. BY CREDITING TO DEMOCRATIC ECONOMY REDUCTIONS ATTRIBUTABLE TO DEPARTMENT ESTIMATES: AMOUNT, $2,037,855.56.

It is well known that Congress seldom, if ever, makes appropriations equal to or in excess of the estimates, and yet the boasted total includes all the reductions made by the various heads of Departments upon the appropriations of last year. In the pension bill, for instance, the entire saving of $466,500 was made in this way. Owing to a decrease in the amount due pensioners and other causes, the estimate for this year was that much less than the amount appropriated for last year, and yet this sum of $466,500 is credited to democratic economy. The post-office bill also contains many items of this kind, all of which go to swell the total of democratic saving. Nearly all the other bills have many similar items, every one of which is included as a part of the total reduction and credited to the superior economy of the present House of Representatives, whereas if credit is due anywhere it is to the carefulness of republican officials in submitting their estimates.

The items thus reduced appear in the following statement:

6. BY CREDITING TO THE PRETENDED REDUCTION CERTAIN ITEMS APPROPRIATED LAST YEAR FOR OBJECTS WHICH WERE FULLY PROVIDED FOR BY THAT APPROPRIATION, AND, OF COURSE, DO NOT RE-APPEAR IN THE HOUSE BILLS THIS YEAR: AMOUNT, $2,611,768.48.

As an instance of this kind, take the item in the sundry civil bill "for completing the jail in the District of Columbia." The jail having been completed and paid for by that appropriation, it can scarcely be claimed as a very remarkable feat of democratic economy that the same amount was not appropriated again this year. And yet this item figures as a part of the total saving. The sundry civil bill alone contains items of this character amounting to nearly $1,500,000, all of which are credited as a democratic saving in the grand total. The other bills embrace many similar items, as the annexed table will show:

7. BY CREDITING TO ECONOMY AND REFORM REDUCTIONS MADE IN APPROPRIATIONS WHICH TAKE NO MONEY OUT OF THE TREASURY: AMOUNT, $302,165.

The following table will illustrate the value of this kind of retrenchment. The national banks are required to deposit money in the Treasury to pay all the employés engaged in the Redemption Bureau, and, while there is a formal appropriation for that purpose, every dollar is re-imbursed out of the funds thus deposited by the banks. The House cut down the appropriations for this purpose $201,496, and take to themselves credit for "saving" so much to the Treasury. Another item of reduction is for official postage-stamps, which cost the Government nothing, except the nominal sum for printing. Neither of these items are in any sense a saving of money, but the reductions would count in the grand aggregate. And hence there was the same tenacity of purpose in cutting them down as if a real economy could be thereby effected. These items demonstrate the fact that "reduction," and not "economy," was the motive which dictated the so-called reform.

8. BY AN ARBITRARY AND UNREASONABLE REDUCTION OF THE CLERICAL FORCE IN THE VARIOUS DEPARTMENTS, WHEREBY THE PUBLIC SERVICE WOULD BE SERIOUSLY EMBARRASSED AND ITS EFFICIENCY IMPAIRED.

The total number of clerks and employés in the several Departments is 5,308; the number allowed by House bill, 4,105; total reduction made by the House, 1,203, or 22.6 per cent. of the entire force. The Senate Committee on Appropriations, after the most careful examination and full consultation with the various heads of the Departments, came to the conclusion that a reduction of 318 was as much as the service could stand without serious embarrassment and detriment to the business of the Departments. This opinion of the committee was based upon a careful and thorough examination of the subject by the heads of Departments. The then Secretary of the Treasury Mr. Bristow, furnished the committee, at their request, a tabulated statement showing what, in his judgment, was the largest reduction that could safely be made in his Department. Mr. Taft, then Secretary of War, appointed a committee of three of the most competent and experienced men of his Department to examine the subject. That committee spent some twenty days in the investigation, going from desk to desk, ascertaining what every clerk was doing, and whenever possible consolidating their work. Their report submitted to the Committee on Appropriations the lowest practicable reductions in that Department. Similar careful and conscientious investigations were made by all the other heads of Departments, and their reports were, as I have said, the basis on which the Senate acted in reducing the number 318.

I am fully convinced that the House reduction of 1,203 was made without the facts necessary to arrive at a correct conclusion, and mainly in conformity with the proclamation which had been issued at the beginning of the session, that "$40,000,000 reduction must be made" at any sacrifice to the public service. It is not true, as is so often alleged, that the force in these Departments has been extravagantly increased since the war. On the contrary, the economical policy pursued by the republican party has constantly reduced it as the work diminished. Every year this force has undergone the careful scrutiny of both Committees on Appropriations, and nearly every year large reductions have been made. Any person who will compare the number of clerks employed in the various Departments for the years 1860 and 1875 with the amount of work performed in those years, respectively, will find that the force is relatively much smaller now than in 1860. Let me give a few illustrations from the Treasury Department. In the First Auditor's Office the cost for accounts settled was in 1860 $4.10, in 1875 $3.06.

Object.	1860.	1875.
SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE.
Number of accounts settled	2,174	25,347
Number of employés	24	176
Number of accounts settled to each employé	90	144
Cost per account	$16 34	$9 68
THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE.
Number of accounts settled	2,300	19,13
Number of employés	61	17
Number of accounts settled by each clerk	39½	111⅝
Average cost per account	$35 00	$12 30

Substantially the same relation of force and service is maintained throughout the Treaury Department. I have compared the number of accounts and cost of settlement, because it is the most convenient form of comparison. The accounts are generally larger now than in 1860, and hence require more time and labor. It will be seen from these illustrations that the force was relatively from 25 to nearly 300 per cent. larger in 1860 that now. If the comparison be extended through all the Departments, it will be found that the force has not increased at all in proportion to the service rendered.

The reduction of the force therefore below the number recommended by the heads of Departments and fixed by the Senate amendments is merely arbitrary, without good reason, and at the expense of efficiency, safety, and economy in the transaction of public business.

9. BY REDUCTION OF SALARIES UPON A HORIZONTAL RULE, WITHOUT REFERENCE TO VALUE OF SERVICE RENDERED OR COMPENSATION PAID.

A saving is doubtless effected by this expedient. In some cases salaries which have been fixed since the war will bear reduction, though as a general rule none of them are extravagant. A just and reasonable economy would therefore select such as are disproportioned to the services rendered, and reduce them accordingly. Not so the partisan decree, which, right or wrong, must make a grand pretended saving for political purposes. The compensation of employés in various Departments, with the exception of those fixed at $1,200 and less, was reduced by the House bill upon the horizontal rule of 10 per cent. Nearly all of these salaries were fixed by the democratic party in 1854, when the cost of living in Washington was at least one-third less than it now is. A salary of $1,200 would enable a clerk to live more comfortably in this city in 1854 than with a salary of $1,800 in 1876. There is, therefore, no justice in applying the 10 per cent. reduction to these persons. The "saving" effected by it cannot commend itself to the sense of fair play which distinguishes the American people. They have already seen that the business of the Departments is now conducted more cheaply and economically than it was in 1860. The amount of work done by the clerks is much greater in proportion to numbers than it was then.

This gross injustice is sought to be covered by making a 10 per cent. reduction on the salaries of members of Congress. It is said, "See how equitably we have done this thing! We reduce our own compensation to the same extent we do others." But is it equitable? The salary of a member of Congress in 1854 was only $3,000 a year. Since then it has been raised to $5,000. If the compensation of clerks, fixed in 1854, is to be reduced 10 per cent., why not reduce the salary of a member of Congress to $2,700? I admit, of course, that this would be an inadequate compensation, but not more so than to reduce a second-class clerk from $1,400 to $1,260. If political exigencies require the poorly paid clerks to contribute to the grand total one-tenth of their salaries fixed in 1854, then I say let members of Congress come up to the mark like men and apply the same principle to themselves that they apply to others. This would be even-handed justice; nothing more. To be plain about it, Mr. President, this 10 per cent. horizontal reduction in the House bill is sheer and shameless demagogism, inaugurated by men who only three years ago on the last night of the session voted themselves $7,500 a year and "back pay" for an entire Congress. Some of them, with $5,000 of "back pay" in their pockets, now seek to conciliate the American people by reducing their salaries $500 a year. Why, Mr. President, they can well afford to do it, for the interest on their "back pay" at 10 per cent. per annum will make good the loss by reduction. The poorly paid clerks, however, have no such resource to fall back upon.

10. REPUDIATION OF NATIONAL OBLIGATIONS: AMOUNT, $1,611,000.

This is illustrated by the denial of appropriations to pay judgments of the Court of Claims, on which some $2,000,000 were estimated for this year and over $800,000 are now due. Such an omission could only be an inexcusable mistake or naked repudiation. It was not a mistake and was not overlooked. This court was organized by ourselves to decide upon claims against the United States. It is an arbiter of our own selection. We have invited claimants to submit to its arbitrament. They have accepted our invitation, and judgments to the amount above mentioned have been rendered in their favor and are now unpaid. The final judgments of this court are as binding upon the honor of the nation as the public debt, and neither can be denied nor delayed without a stain of repudiation. The amount appropriated for this purpose last year was $400,000. This year nothing. Why this inexcusable omission? The answer is obvious. The sum required was too large. It would never do to swell the appropriations this year by the large amount which was necessary to save the national honor. By appropriating nothing, a comparison could be shown of $400,000 saved as against the extravagance of last year. Therefore the $800,000 must be repudiated in order to get credit for saving $400,000. In the partisan scales by which national honor and political necessities were weighed the former kicked the beam.

The comparative saving effected by this expedient is $400,000, which figures in the boasted total, and will contribute to the marvelous exhibit of economy to be made this fall. In the name of reason, why stop at this small amount? Why not repudiate all the other obligations of the Government and thereby save hundreds of millions?

The District of Columbia furnishes another instance of repudiated obligations in the House bills. It may be true that no law pledges the Government to contribute a fair proportion of the current expenses of the District government, but fairness and common honesty do. The United States own nearly, if not quite, one-half the property in the District, which pays no taxes, but which is as much benefited by good government in the District as is the property of private citizens. We make laws for the District and by those laws have denied the citizens all power to raise money by taxation until December next. We have imposed upon them certain duties that require money, and having taken from them the means of raising it by taxation we provide that their officers shall not borrow, under penalty of imprisonment in the penitentiary and heavy fines, and then refuse to appropriate our share of the current expenses. Last year $1,060,000 was appropriated; this year nothing. Consequently $1,060,000 appears as a "saving" in the grand total. It is true it was not necessary to contribute more than $500,000 this year; but even that sum was refused by the House, because it would to that extent have diminished the difference between the appropriations of the two years, and hence the total reduction, which must at any sacrifice of national honor and fair dealing be kept as nearly as possible to the promised $40,000,000. The Indian bill also contains several omissions to comply with treaty stipulations, by which considerable sums were "saved," and probably ten times the amount will as a consequence be expended in Indian wars.

11. BY DENYING APPROPRIATIONS ADEQUATE TO PROVIDE THE ORDINARY MEANS OF NATIONAL DEFENSE: AMOUNT, $5,353,990.

The fortification bill of last year was reduced to the lowest amount consistent with the preservation of our forts in a condition to be of use in case of a foreign war. Only $850,000 was appropriated. The House bills this year appropriate only $315,000, which amounts to a virtual surrender of the forts as a means of national defense. The "saving" achieved by this surrender is $535,000. Whether it will prove a wise reduction depends upon our future relations to foreign powers and upon the question whether ordinary prudence requires us to preserve in a state of reasonable efficiency the defenses we now have. We are probably safe in taking the chances of a foreign war this year, and it was doubtless expected that when the present political exigencies shall have passed adequate appropriations will be made. The reduction for the current year will have to be added to the appropriation bills of next Congress, unless we propose to abandon all our external defenses and open our gates to any foreign foe that may be tempted to prey upon a defenseless people. It has been argued in favor of these reduced appropriations for this purpose that fortifications are out of date, because more efficient and cheaper means of defense have been discovered. But, pray, what are they? Certainly not torpedoes, for these, too, have been denied as well as fortifications. By reference to the naval bill it will be seen that to save the sum of $56,000 the torpedo service has been seriously crippled and the appropriation for "torpedo boats" wholly denied.

I turn next to the Navy to see if any means have there been provided which are to take the place of our substantially abandoned system of fortifications. Here I find that the same ruthless hand which struck down forts and arsenals and destroyed the efficiency of the torpedo service has fallen even more destructively upon our navy-yards and ships of war. With $50,000,000 invested in navy-yards, for which at least 1 per cent., or $500,000, was imperatively needed for repairs and preservation, not one cent was allowed by the House bills. The appropriation last year for repairs and improvements of navy-yards was about 2 per cent. on their cost, or $1,090,000; this year nothing. Consequently by permitting this vast property to go to decay and ruin a reduction of $1,090,000 was effected.

For the preservation of vessels $3,300,000 was appropriated last year; only $1,500,000 by the House bill. Here is another reduction, called democratic economy and reform, by which the grand aggregate saving is increased $1,800,000. What is to be the effect? I am reliably informed by the officer in charge of this branch of the service that "the effect of this reduction will be to increase the cost of repairs another year by an amount which cannot now be estimated, and which will have to be provided for in future appropriations either at the next or the following session of Congress." Another result will be to stop the repairs now in progress upon the Wyoming, Lancaster, Monadnock, and the iron-clads Terror, Miantonomoh, Puritan, Quinnebaugh, Galena, Mohican, Shenandoah, and Monongahela. The repairs on these vessels would put the Navy in a condition to meet any sudden emergency that may occur. The lack of necessary appropriations will put off this means of defense another year, or until the money shall be provided.

For steam-machinery, &c., a reference to the tables will show an appropriation of $1,800,000 last year and only $885,000 this year, and therefore an apparent saving of $915,000. From the very best authority on this subject I have the following statement as to what will be the results of this economy:

> This reduction must necessarily stop all work upon the double-turreted monitors; because the almost total suspension of work in the navy-yards for repairs and refitting of machinery of vessels required for sea service, and put it out of the power of the Department to repair to any great extent the machinery, &c., of any vessel or vessels in the service that may hereafter break down through unforeseen casualties or the ordinary wear and tear of service. The estimates of the Department as submitted to Congress were made at the very lowest point consistent with the preservation, care, and repair of vessels in service and the completion of work on those that are invaluable to the Navy for emergencies.

This, Mr. President, is the manner in which the defensive service of the Republic has been mutilated and crippled for partisan ends. These are the means employed to effect a magnificent showing of democratic economy!

Is it true economy thus to allow the $50,000,000 invested in navy-yards to go to ruin in order to save the amount which is necessary to preserve them in a state of efficiency? Is it economy to postpone repairs which must be made this year or the next on vessels of war, and thereby not only render them useless for service, but largely increase the cost of such repairs next year? Is it a wise policy to abandon our means of defense, and thereby invite aggressions from foreign powers? Why this sweeping and relentless crusade upon all provisions which have hitherto been deemed indispensable to the maintenance of our position as a first-class power? Shall all this be done in the name of economy? Is this great nation too poor to maintain the ordinary means of defense? Must her forts be dismantled, her navy-yards be closed, and her ships of war rot at their docks because she is unable to maintain them? Is it possible that any other motive less patriotic than frugality has guided the blow which has fallen so heavily and unerringly on every part of our system of national defenses? I will not believe that under the sacred name of economy there was a lurking design to render the Republic powerless for defense against her foes; and yet if such had been the motive it would have been difficult to have devised means more efficient than those which have been chosen. This policy of a democratic House finds its only parallel in that which governed a democratic administration in 1860. Let us hope the parallel does not extend to the purposes by which each was actuated.

I submit a table showing the various branches of the service on which these reductions were made.

There remains to be considered but one other of the various classes of reductions mentioned in table C, the class termed "Miscellaneous reductions," amounting to $4,544,192.91. In this class I have included all items of which a considerable portion could be deemed a judicious reduction, giving the benefit of a doubt in all cases to the action of the House. It is true, however, that of this amount there are many items of which large portions are reductions that may prove injurious to the public service, but as a whole it is believed that the $4,544,192.91 may be fairly attributed to a reasonable and just economy.

I would not be understood as saying that in the exercise of a wise discretion a much greater reduction than this could not have been safely made. On the contrary, I am convinced, from a careful examination of every item contained in the House bills, that a reduction of from eight to ten millions (which is about equal to the average reductions made for the last seven years) could have been effected without serious embarrassment or injury to the public service. In many of the items included in the other classes some reductions could have been safely and judiciously made. I have not, however, credited such portions to a proper economy, because the sweeping and indiscriminate manner in which these reductions were made by the House bills will be far more likely to result in a loss than in a saving to the Government.

Up to a certain point retrenchment is economy; beyond that point it becomes parsimonious extravagance. Take for illustration the collection of internal revenue, in which a saving could have been safely effected upon last year's appropriations. But instead of stopping at the point where economy ends and waste begins, the House bills reduced the number of districts and the appropriations so low as to render morally certain a loss of revenue greater than the entire saving. The same thing is true as to the appropriations for mints; the reduction of clerical force below the point of efficiency and safety in the transaction of public business; the refusal to provide for preservation and repairs of navy-yards and naval vessels; the denial of means for searching rebel archives, whereby millions may be lost to the Treasury, and the general and almost universal mutilations of the public service. In fact this principle of indiscriminate cutting and slashing at all the branches of the public service for the purpose of being able to present to the country for political effect a large pretended saving pervades all the bills, and will in all probability result in an injury and a loss to the country greater than the whole amount that by a wise and judicious retrenchment could have been saved. I think I am right, therefore, in saying that in all this vaunted economy and reform there is not a real saving of $5,000,000.

The items which I have credited to economy upon the principle just stated will be found in the following table:

Mr. President, this review has disclosed the principles upon which the House bills were framed, and some of the devices and expedients employed to accomplish the result desired. They constitute an interesting, if not a humiliating, study of the political economist, and illustrate the new order of statesmanship which is expected to accomplish so much for economy and reform.

At the commencement of the present session it was announced with a great flourish of trumpets from the other end of the Capitol that a grand saving of $40,000,000 should be made upon the amounts appropriated last year. Without much thought as to consequences or any very definite knowledge of the wants of the public service, but with an eye single to the exigencies of the approaching presidential campaign, it was boastingly proclaimed that a saving of that amount would be effected, whereby the charge of extravagance would be fastened upon the republican administration.

I confess I had some curiosity to know how it was to be done. Having been a member of the Committee on Appropriations for six years I knew how earnestly, faithfully, and successfully both Houses of Congress had striven to apply the principles of true economy in cutting down the expenditures of the Government to the lowest point consistent with the efficiency of the public service and the sacred obligations of the nation. I knew that as the result of that effort the net ordinary expenditures had been reduced from $229,915,088.11 in 1868 to $171,521,848.27 in 1875, making a total reduction in seven years of $58,393,239.84, or an annual average reduction of $8,341,891.40. I knew also that the reduction made at last session of Congress was $13,313,322.17 below the expenditures of 1875.

I was aware that a wise and economical administration of public affairs could, as the necessities of the service changed, continue the reductions which have marked the policy of the last few years, but I was curious to know what new and unheard-of principles of economy could be evoked that would enable the present House of Representatives to make the sweeping reduction of $40,000,000 in a single year.

A partial explanation has been found in the character of the advisers from whom in some cases the wants of the public service were ascertained. The persons whose advice had most weight, in some instances, were not the responsible heads of the Executive Departments.

The recommendations of these gentlemen were generally treated with contempt, and sometimes with insult. They seem to have been regarded as mere leeches upon the Treasury, who were seeking to wring from an unwilling Congress the last dollar possible without reference to the necessities of the service intrusted to their charge, while discharged employés who had grievances to redress were taken into confidence and the public service provided for in accordance with their suggestions. To illustrate: The clerk of one of the committees which had much to do in deciding upon the expenditures necessary for one of the most important Departments had been discharged from that Department for drunkenness and general bad character. He had formerly been discharged from a city post-office for gambling and dishonesty; and yet he was the kind of "reformer" selected to guide the judgment of men who were bound by their duty as legislators to make adequate and proper provision for the important service of that Department.

Another clerk who had been discharged for receiving bribes had the confidence of prominent gentlemen to such an extent that he was appointed deputy sergeant-at-arms to serve subpœnas for one of the committees, and doubtless gave much valuable information as to the appropriations necessary for the Department from which he had been dismissed in disgrace. With such advisers it would have been quite as easy to reduce one hundred millions as forty.

One might have supposed that an enlightened statesmanship would have chosen the best sources of information and would have first examined the wants and necessities of the public service and ascertained how great a curtailment it would bear without injury, before announcing the reduction to be made. Not so in this case. The only question seems to have been, "What do the partisan exigencies of the times demand?" the answer being, "Forty millions reduction." The iron rule was laid upon all the appropriation bills and as nearly as possible forty millions were cut off. If this line of policy crippled a Department or Bureau, violated a law or a treaty, omitted an important public service, or repudiated a national obligation, the knife was not withheld, but went crashing through as if the civil service of the country was a myth instead of a solemn fact.

The motive which impelled the knife of "reform" is apparent. It was well understood that if a grand total of $40,000,000 reduction could be shown it would be quite impossible for the average voter to analyze the items and known by what means or upon what principle it was accomplished. The fact itself would stand out prominently. It could be stated in a single sentence, while the explanation would involve tedious details which would be within the reach of but few. Hence at any cost to the service and at any sacrifice of national obligation or even of honor, that reduction must be made. The people could then be told by every democratic orator and newspaper in the country that "$40,000,000 have been saved," and with eyes and mouths wide open in admiration of this marvelous economy, they would be expected to march to the polls and deposit a democratic ballot next November.

Mr. President, this hasty review has disclosed some of the desperate devices and expedients employed for the fulfillment of a promise made in the recklessness of partisan malice and ruthlessly executed (so far as it could be without too great danger of exposing its real motives) solely for partisan purposes. In this frantic effort to fasten upon the republican party the groundless charge of extravagance by pretended democratic retrenchment we have seen laws disregarded, treaties violated, national obligations repudiated, important branches of the public service wholly omitted, and nearly all its parts mangled and mutilated, the system of national defenses paralyzed, Government property valued at scores of millions left without anything for preservation and repairs, the vaults of the Treasury thrown open to pillage by the utter denial of the only means by which evidence can be furnished to enable the Government to defend itself against the myriads of claims pressing upon it. All this, Mr. President, in the sacred name of "reform!"

But notwithstanding these persistent and desperate efforts, notwithstanding the utter disregard of the wants of the public service, the promise has not been made good by more than $10,000,000. The vaunted reduction of forty millions has dwindled to less than thirty. Failing even by all the desperate expedients to which I have referred to redeem the pledge so boastingly proclaimed at the beginning of the session, in their despair resort seems to have been had to arithmetic, and even figures, under partisan manipulations, lost their proverbial truthfulness and $29,594,187.38 were forced to read $39,421,961.

I repeat what I have already said, that of the total pretended reduction not $5,000,000 can be called a saving of money to the Treasury, and for the proof of this assertion I refer to detailed statements appended to my remarks, in which each item of reduction will be found and a brief statement of its character annexed. Deduct the "postponements," the "deficiencies," the "failure to provide for important branches of the public service," the "reductions attributable to Department estimates," the "appropriations which take no money from the Treasury," the "repudiation of national obligations," and the "denial of appropriations for national defenses," and the vaunted saving will fall very far below the reductions made by the last Congress, which amounted to $13,313,322.17.

The difficulties encountered in the attempt to make the sweeping reduction intended arose from the fact that for several years republican Congresses had faithfully and successfully applied the strictest rules of retrenchment consistent with the efficiency of the public service and the best interests of the country. Gradual retrenchment, as the demands of the service charged, are still possible, and would have been as faithfully carried out in the future as they have been in the past. But the sweeping reduction which had been promised was utterly impracticable without making its motive too apparent.

NO REDUCTION OF TAXES.

The reason assigned for these indiscriminate and generally indiscreet reductions is that thereby the burdens will be lifted from the shoulders of an over-taxed people. But pray what have these gentlemen done to reduce taxation? An eight-months session of Congress is within one or two days of its close, and yet with an almost two-thirds majority in the House of Representatives not one act has been passed reducing taxation. Scarcely an effort has been made in that direction. There has been a faint pretense of modifying the tariff law by the Committee of Ways and Means, but the bill never came to a vote. Mere reduction of appropriations will bring no relief to the people unless accompanied by reduction of taxation. These gentlemen doubtless understood that the reduction in appropriations was a mere sham, and that they would not warrant any diminution of revenues. Or possibly the retrenchment in appropriations was intended to withhold money from the public service in order that there may be something in the Treasury to pay the $160,000,000 of claims and other schemes which are said to have been presented in the House during the present session. The refusal to reduce taxation in connection with the reduction of appropriations and the persistent denial of all means to furnish evidence for the defeat of these claims certainly give color to this apprehension.

The policy pursued by the republican party has been to reduce taxation as they reduced expenditures. The taxes from customs and internal revenue have been reduced from $379,438,130.93 in 1870 to $264,772,716.64 in 1876; making a total reduction in five years amounting to $114,665,414.29, or an average annual reduction of $22,933,082. That party knows no object in retrenching expenditures except to reduce taxation.

HONESTY OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY VINDICATED BY THE DEMOCRACY.

The utter failure to fasten upon the republican party the charge of extravagance is only equaled by the failure to prove the sweeping charges of corruption which have been so often repeated within the last few years. Thirty-three investigating committees have been at work for nearly eight months, with all the vigor, persistency, and frantic desperation that partisan malice and ambition could inspire, to prove the republican party unworthy the confidence of the American people. They have roamed at will through all the records of the fifteen years during which that party has been in power, including, as they do, four years of war with all its demoralizations. The whole power of the Government has been at their command. No relations were too sacred for invasion. No witness was too depraved to be denied a hearing. No expense was too great, if thereby the character of a republican official could be smirched. A statement has recently been publicly made by a member of the Appropriation Committee of the House to the effect that the expenditures for this purpose will not fall much short of $1,000,000. The very dregs of society have been called upon to contribute their choice morsels to the feast of scandal. Men whose reputations are the result of a life-work for humanity have been held up before the country for months as very demons incarnate, while scandal-mongers, like foul birds of prey, feasted and fattened upon the heart pangs of their victims. Millions of people have read the foul charges bruited against them where hundreds only will ever know of their triumphant vindication.

Yet with all this saturnalia of defamation what has been accomplished? How many republican officials have been proven guilty of corruption? How many dollars has the Government lost by republican dishonesty? What is the sum-total of this work of a Congress which has wholly neglected the interests of the people and devoted its entire energies to detraction? Unable to answer these questions I have sought for information in vain from democratic Senators. A few days since the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] indulged in general denunciations of the republican party, in which he took occasion to say that "from the crown of its head to the sole of its foot, judging by its acts for the last eight years, it is nothing but bruises and putrefying sores." I thought surely an honorable Senator who could utter such language in this place would be able and willing to inform me upon what he based charges so offensive to one-half of the American people. Contrary to my usual habit I interrupted the honorable Senator, to ask him the following question:

Mr. WINDOM. My purpose in rising a moment ago was to appeal to my friend from Delaware not to permit his courtesy to those whom he called thieves to prevent his giving us the names of those exposed by the House of Representatives We hear a great deal of "this corruption" in general terms. We have heard a great deal to-day. Now I beg my friend that he will not allow his regard for thieves, as he calls them, to prevent our having their names.

To which appeal for definite information as to the results achieved by the thirty-three committees of investigation at a cost of many hundreds of thousands to the Treasury, I received the following instructive reply:

Mr. SAULSBURY. My honorable friend will have access to the reports, and I commend them to him as good reading for every day in the week except the Sabbath, and on the Sabbath day I would ask him to read some of the chapters of Nehemiah, where he will find a perfect illustration of the oppressions which this republican party has brought upon the country. He will find there that when Nehemiah went up to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, after he had become re-instated, the people cried out and complained to him of the oppression which their rulers had placed around them, and he called the rulers before him and compelled them to disgorge and deliver back the mortgaged property to those who had been oppressed. Let me tell my friend when our Nehemiah comes in on the 4th of March, and the democrats have the power in the House and in the Senate, we intend to call upon plunderers everywhere to disgorge their ill-gotten gains, and to place them back in the Treasury, or in the conscience fund, if you please.

Mr. President, you see how my earnest search for information was rewarded. An honorable Senator who can denounce a great party, composed of the best and purest men of the nation, as utterly corrupt, can find no better answer when called upon to specify his charges than a general reference to the reports of the committees, and to the book of Nehemiah. From all I can learn of said reports I am about as likely to find an answer to my question in the one place as in the other. Not quite satisfied with the definiteness of the confirmation thus acquired, I pursued my quest for knowledge in another direction. The honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] who is always ready to support his assertions with statistics of some kind (the quality being sometimes a little questionable) had been most unsparing in his denunciations of the party to which I belong. Knowing that if my honorable friend from North Carolina could not give us the "statistics" of our crimes, it would be of no avail to pursue my inquiries further, I ventured to make the following suggestion to him, as appears in the RECORD of July 19:

Mr. WINDOM. The question put by the honorable Senator from Indiana was as to what had been revealed by the investigating committees this winter. The honorable Senator, in answer to that, has dug up an old report, made by a republican Congress, that has no earthly connection with the investigations this winter. * * * I want to appeal to him, for I know his good nature, to state if any frauds have been unearthed by these committees wherein the Government has lost any money; and, if so, who it is and how much the Government has lost?

Mr. MERRIMON. In the first place, as I said a moment ago, it is exceedingly unpleasant to go into detail in regard to individuals. I do not like to be forced to make personal remarks about anybody, even persons not in the Senate. It is not a pleasant duty to any well-disposed person; but a complete answer to that question—and I think my friend from Delaware answered it awhile ago—is this: The reports, for the most part, of the committees of the House which have been engaged in investigating the frauds and corruptions that have been practiced on the Government are not yet made and printed. What they will develop when they are made remains to be seen. I have seen snatches of some of them that did develop villainies and rascalities not only disgraceful to the republican party but disgraceful to the American people. If I were disposed to state them now I cannot remember the names, nor is it material for me to do so.

I was aware, Mr. President, that it was "not a pleasant duty for a well-disposed person" to go into "details in regard to individuals," especially when such "well-disposed person" was a little "short" with reference to such details. But still it occurred to me that even a "well-disposed person" who could say of a great party that the "demon of corruption has such a hold upon this organization that they cannot throw it off" might be willing to so far waive his courtesy toward thieves as to give us at least one name; so I venture to press my "well-disposed" friend a little further:

Mr. WINDOM. I want to ask the Senator whether it is merely a lack of memory which renders him unable to mention a single name of a person who has been proved guilty by these investigating committees of defrauding the Government, or whether it is due to the courtesy of the honorable Senator toward those he designates as thieves?

Mr. MERRIMON. I want to say to my honorable friend that if I knew the name of one as charged by a committee of the House I would not tell the Senate now; but there have been frauds developed. I know that to be the fact. I have read them in reports made in the House. Besides I have not the reports before me now. I would not state them from memory. I would not do anybody injustice. It does seem to me that the Senator has a poor way of getting a question answered by asking a question of a Senator who has the floor which he knows cannot be answered at the moment because of the want of the very reports he ought to have in order to answer properly.

The "statistics" of my "well-disposed" friend from North Carolina having never failed him before, I began to feel discouraged. But not utterly hopeless I renewed my interrogatory in another form, designed to prick his sense of moral responsibility:

Mr. WINDOM. I want to ask the Senator if he considers it a proper thing to do, when unable to remember or to give the name of a single individual who has been guilty, or as to a single dollar that has been lost, to make a charge of universal corruption upon the whole party? Is that quite the thing to do?

Mr. MERRIMON. It is, where I know the general fact to be true. I know the general fact to be true. When you come to specify particular items, I may not be able to state them, but I can state the general fact.

Mr. WINDOM. I am asking the Senator how he knows the general fact to be true when he cannot state a single item constituting that general fact?

Mr. MERRIMON. In my speech this morning I showed, and I challenge any Senator to deny them, taking the figures from the record, that over a billion dollars that ought to have gone to the public Treasury did not go there.

I now discovered that I had overrated the honorable Senator's "statistical" powers in presuming him to be as able in details as in generalities, and that while he is perfectly at home on a subject that has "billions in it," he is somewhat hazy when asked to state any of the items which constitute those "billions." In other words, he is much greater on generalities than on specifications—a characteristic, by the way, shared very largely by other members of his party. They are generally "well-disposed persons" as to details, but very savages as to generalities. Seeing that my friend's mind was inclined to wander from the question, and that he found it much easier to show (what we already knew) that frauds and misconduct had been discovered, exposed, and punished in our own party and by our own party, (a thing, by the way, never done by the democracy, I ventured to draw his mind back from its wanderings to the real question at issue.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator to stick to his text. He has told us what a wonderfully good thing the democratic House has accomplished this winter, and I am on a little line of inquiry in order to ascertain what it is. He appeals again to some old report of a republican investigating committee with regard to the internal revenue, but wholly evades the question as to what these investigations have done. I ask the honorable Senator if it is not a fact that after there have been twenty or thirty investigating committees at work, after they have ransacked penitentiaries and lunatic asylums, when the whole power of this Government has been behind them, the whole Treasury of the Government at their command, and with all the enmity, the vengeful feeling, they had against the republican party, with these investigations going on for seven months, my friend is unable to point to a single dollar lost by this Government or a single man who has been convicted of stealing from it?

Mr. MERRIMON. I am not only able to point to a single dollar, but I can point to millions.

Mr. WINDOM. Let us have it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I can point to millions in general terms, but I cannot specify items now because of the absence of the reports. It is amazing that the Senator should make such a statement as he does in view of the facts that stare him and the American people in the face on every hand. Look at the whisky rings at Saint Louis, at Chicago, Indianapolis, and elsewhere.

How discouraging to an anxious, earnest inquirer after truth! Still "millions" in it, but not one dollar specified. Still ready to enlighten me with reference to frauds discovered and punished by my own party friends at Saint Louis, Chicago, Indianapolis, and elsewhere, but not able to name a single instance in which the thirty-three democratic committees has discovered a dollar lost by the Government through dishonesty of republican officials! Quite disheartened with my efforts to gain knowledge under such difficulties, I made only one more appeal.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator yield to me again for a moment?

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir; I will not yield to my friend again. I think the debate now is not profitable to either side. It is mere desultory colloquy.

Mr. WINDOM. That has been my impression for some time.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not think it is, because neither of us is dealing in facts. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. WINDOM. I am very happy to hear the Senator say that. I do not make that confession for myself.

Utterly discouraged, I withdrew from my fruitless search for information, and left the honorable Senator to the contemplation of the "billions" stolen by the Republican party and to his general charges of universal corruption.

Mr. President, I have referred to these colloquies to show the utter failure of the thirty-three investigating committees to sustain the general charges of corruption which are so flippantly and constantly preferred against the republican party. That some dishonest men have found a place in that organization no body doubts; but is it not remarkable that under all the circumstances so few have been blackened? After eight months of such investigations as we have witnessed, directed against a party which has been in power fifteen years, during which time it has saved the life of the Republic and collected and paid out billions of dollars for that purpose, is it not most remarkable that two astute Senators on this floor are utterly unable to name a single man whom those committees have detected in stealing from the Government or a single dollar stolen from the Treasury, and that when pressed upon this point they are compelled to fall back upon what the republican party has itself exposed and punished?

I come now to another phase of the effort to fasten the charge of corruption on the republican party. My good democratic friend, the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] for whom I entertain the highest personal regard and the warmest feelings of friendship, not quite assured of the success of the investigating committees and from his position on the Committee of Appropriations knowing too much of the economy heretofore practiced by Congress in the matter of appropriations to believe the "retrenchment" dodge would work, and yet being thoroughly impressed with the necessity of discovering some appalling evidence of republican dishonesty, invoked the authority of the Senate to interrogate the books of the Treasury Department with reference to defalcations that have occurred under republican administrations.

My honorable friend was quite able to control his enthusiasm with reference to the names of defaulters prior to the time when the republican party came into power, and hence his resolution was carefully framed to avoid the "dead past." By the way, Mr. President, let me wander a moment far enough to say that this same "dead past," which our democratic friends are so anxious to bury and about which they so deprecate discussion, is bounded in their chronology by the line which divides democratic from republican administrations. Everything done since 1860, when the republican party came into power, is a proper subject for discussion and partisan animadversion. All of the last fifteen years belong, in their estimation, to the "living present;" but the moment you cross the line and extend your inquiries to the sixteenth year you are among the graves of the "dead past," and must tread lightly lest you wake up unpleasant memories which our democratic friends have fondly hoped were buried forever. Doubtless this reverence of my friend from West Virginia for the solemn shades of the "dead past," as well as his aversion to waking up disagreeable memories had much to do with his desire to limit his inquiries only to the "living present." A prudence also, which was doubtless born of the experience of his party friends at the other end of the Capitol, warned him to beware of searching for republican corruption in democratic neighborhoods, lest odors unpleasant to democratic olfactories might be evolved.

But the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who has recently crushed with a heavy hand so many budding democratic hopes just beginning to take root in the statistics furnished by the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] and the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] with an utter disregard for the feelings of our democratic friends toward the "dead past," in which they have so earnestly endeavored to bury their deeds forever from human sight and memory, reported an amendment to the resolution of my friend from West Virginia, whereby he was not only permitted to interrogate the living present but he was commanded also to question the musty records of the past.

Not at all anxious to go forward into the ghostly presence of the sainted dead, but fearing to turn back, my honorable friend from West Virginia, armed with senatorial authority far in excess of what he had sought or desired, and trembling in fear of the possible consequences of his irreverent tread among the graves of his party friends, proceeded to the Treasury. The rusty hinges of the long-closed vaults gave forth a mournful shriek as their doors swung open in response to his senatorial demands. Appalled at the sight which greeted his astonished vision, gladly would he have turned away without the information which had so long been the desire of his heart.

This, however, was quite impossible; for behind him stood the republican Senate, and in that Senate still stood the inexorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] relentlessly determined to have the whole story, no matter who might be hurt thereby. Finally, seeing no way of escape from the dilemma in which his honest effort to expose republican rascality had placed him, my honorable friend from West Virginia, with an assumed courage which did great credit to his self-control, challenged these slumbering records to open their mouths and testify what they knew about defalcations of Government officials under the various administrations from Washington to Grant. The following is a condensed statement of the answer which came forth from these musty tomes of the "dead past:"

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, WASHINTON, D. C., August 10, 1876.

Statement showing the receipts and disbursements of the Government from its organization to June 30, 1875; exhibiting also the amount of defalcations and the ratio of such losses per $1,000 to the aggregate received and disbursed, arranged as nearly as practicable in periods of Administrations, and also in the periods prior and subsequent to June 30, 1861; prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

It only remains for me to add, for the benefit of the friends of the Senator from West Virginia, that since the consequences of his heroic effort to expose the corruptions of this administration and to prove the honesty of the democratic party have been fully realized, he has devoted himself mainly to humming, in a half-bewildered way, those familiar and solemn words, "Hark from the tombs a doleful sound," occasionally varying the monotony of the strain by an attack upon the style of book-keeping inaugurated in the Treasury by my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

Mr. President, the retrenchment scheme has only disclosed the recklessness and partisan malice of our opponents, and proves the wise and judicious economy of the republican party. The effort to fasten upon us the charge of extravagance has recoiled upon their own heads.

The thirty-three investigation committees and the examinations of the books of the Treasury have only confirmed the people in their confidence. What more complete and triumphant vindication of the integrity of the party could be desired? Gentlemen, general charges will no longer be tolerated by the people. You told them to give you the power and you would unearth a seething mass of corruption that would astonish the world. They gave you the power and you have utterly failed. You have had ample opportunity to make good your charges if it were possible to do so. Henceforth the people will demand proof instead of assertions. It will not do for you to point to the men whom we ourselves have exposed and punished. That only proves the republican party to possess a power which yours never dreamed of, namely, the power to purify itself.

Do you reply that a Cabinet officer has fallen under your fire? True he has been disgraced, but not for stealing from the Government. Do you argue that the fall of this prominent officer convicts the party of corruption? If so, George Washington's administration was also corrupt, for his Secretary of State was not only proven guilty of an intrigue with an embassador of a foreign government for the overthrow of his own, but also of receiving money for that purpose.

Vindicated by its enemies, united in its own ranks, and strong for the contest, the republican party will march to certain victory in November.

The following tables show all the items appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1876; the corresponding items appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1877; the reductions made by the House bills at this session; and the character of such reductions the items marked thus * being additions.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL BILL.

The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, for the year ending June 30, 1877, compared with the appropriations for the same purpose for the year ending June 30, 1876.

Service for which appropriated.	Appropriated for year ending June 30, 1876.	Appropriated by House bill for year ending June 30, 1877.	Reductions made in House bill.	Remarks upon reductions made in House bill as shown in third column.
1. Compensation and mileage of Senators.	$400,000 00	$363,000 00	$37,000 00	This reduction needs no explanation. To those who believe salaries are too high it will commend itself. No expression of public sentiment has required it.
2. Officers and employés of Senate	139,836 80	100,050 00	39,786 80	A small part of this item is legitimate. The number of employés may be somewhat reduced without prejudice.
3. Contingent expenses of Senate	142,440 00	72,690 00	69,750 00	The amount is too small. A deficiency is already required.
4. Reporting debates of Senate	25,000 00	22,500 00	2,500 00	The amount appropriated by House bill is $2,500 less than is necessary to comply with contract. A deficiency.
5. Capitol police	52,600 00	28,600 00	24,000 00	This item is obtained by reducing number and salaries of the Capitol police. A portion of it may be judicious economy; not all.
6. Compensation and mileage of members of House of Representatives.	1,650,000 00	1,459,000 00	191,000 00	The remark appended to the first item will apply to this, with the additional statement that not more than one of the gentlemen who voted for the reduction believed it ought to be made, or really desired it to become the law. Political rather than economical considerations constituted the controlling influence.
7. Officers and employés of the House.	227,590 70	170,150 00	57,440 70	Probably a proper reduction.
8. Contingent expenses of the House	165,385 00	122,088 00	43,297 00	The experience of the past, including that of the present House of Representatives, demonstrates that a large deficiency will be the result of this reduction.
9. Library of Congress	63,986 00	44,850 00	19,136 00	An injudicious reduction, made up by denying the necessary amounts for purchase of books, for exchanges with foreign countries, and by reduction of number and compensation of employés. The expenditure for employés in the Library is now far below that of any other library of its size in the world.
10. Public Printer	18,817 60	.....	18,817 60	An indispensable appropriation entirely omitted by the House. To have denied all appropriations for the public service would have been upon same principle, and a much greater "economy."
11. Public buildings and grounds	52,328 00	32,008 00	20,320 00	A small part of this is a judicious reduction.
12. Executive	78,400 00	64,446 11	13,953 89	This difference arises from reduction of the President's salary, refusing certain employés, and reducing the compensation of all.

The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, &c.—Continued.

Service for which appropriated.	Appropriated for year ending June 30, 1876.	Appropriated by House bill for year ending June 30, 1877.	Reductions made in House bill.	Remarks upon reductions made in House bill as shown in third column.
13. Executive Departments, &c., viz: State, Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, Post-Office, Department of Justice, and Department of Agriculture.	$7,554,434 99	$5,687,901 50	$1,866,533 49	This reduction is made by cutting down a very large number of items, but mainly by reduction of clerical force and salaries. The total number of employés in all the Executive Departments is 5,308; the reduction by the House bill is 1,212—about 22.6 per cent. The heads of all the Departments, and of every bureau, unite in the opinion that this will seriously cripple the public service, and in some cases prove disastrous. In conformity with changes in the service, it is probable a reduction of from three to four hundred could be made without serious injury, but to go beyond that is to impair, to the extent of the reduction, the efficiency of the Departments, by deranging and delaying public business. About $1,200,000 of the "saving" is effected by reducing the force below the number imperatively required. The reduction of salaries covers a very large portion of the balance. In some cases such reduction is proper, but in a very large proportion the salaries were fixed in 1854, when the cost of living was at least 33 per cent. less than now. The reduction upon those is simply withholding a reasonable compensation for services rendered. The amount "saved" by this unjustifiable reduction will cover about $200,000. By omitting entirely to provide for the Signal Office, the Bureau of Military Justice, the Indian Office, Division of Internal Commerce, searching of rebel archives, and rent of certain buildings, $132,340 of the reduction was effected. Many other items which go to make up the reduction of $2,377,277 might be referred to in illustration of the utter fallacy, not to say falsity, of this pretended saving. A careful and thorough analysis of all the items might possibly show an economy of $500,000—not more. The balance is simply a failure to provide adequately for the public service, which must result in deficiencies or great embarrassment.
14. Official postage-stamps for the Executive Departments.	417,669 00	317,000 00	100,669 00	Official postage-stamps cost the Government nothing except the printing. All the other Executive Departments are required to purchase their stamps of the Post-Office Department. Hence it is merely taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another. To call this reduction a saving of money, is an absurdity if not a fraud.
15. Collecting internal revenue	5,387,340 00	3,491,000 00	1,896,340 00	This reduction is composed of several items. A portion of it may be a judicious economy; another portion will prove very detrimental to the service. $730,000 is a reduction recommended by the Department. Possibly $330,000 in addition may be called a legitimate economy, and possibly a part of it may give rise to a deficiency. The remaining $836,340 is simply withholding an amount necessary to the efficiency of the service, which will cost the Government a loss of revenue many times the amount of the pretended saving. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue have both protested against it, on the ground that it will be productive of great losses. The policy which cripples the Government in the collection of its revenues (on which its credit and honor depend) for the sake of making partisan political capital, cannot be too strongly condemned. Reduction within certain limits is economy; beyond that it becomes reckless extravagance. This is a case in point.
16. Mints and assay offices	1,220,145 00	810,110 00	410,035 00	Unquestionably a deficiency. The laws passed at this session require a largely increased silver coinage, and hence an increased expenditure. To reduce the appropriation below the amount used last year, and at the same time require of the mints a greatly increased service is an absurdity, if not something worse. The result will be, either that the silver cannot be coined and consequently cannot go into circulation, or a deficiency will be appropriated next winter. The latter was doubtless intended when the House bill was passed.
17. Territorial governments	322,323 90	189,700 00	132,623 90	A reduction effected by shaving off something from the already low salaries of governors, judges, and other territorial officers, by curtailing incidental expenses, &c. If the United States Government is unable to pay a fair compensation for services rendered, a portion of this reduction is judicious. It is conceded to be an economy, but its character is questioned.
18. Surveyors-general and clerks	151,300 00	.....	151,300 00	This saving is made by wholly omitting a very important service. If an accident, it is inexcusable carelessness; if intentional, it is rank injustice to all the new States and Territories. The survey of the public domain is demanded alike by common sense and long-established usage. The principle upon which this appropriation was denied would stop the wheels of Government entirely.
19. United States courts, marshals, attorneys, &c.	397,250 00	385,500 00	11,750 00	A proper reduction caused by the death of retired judges.
20. Court of Claims	35,390 00	31,640 00	3,750 00	A small reduction made in a very small way, viz, by refusing a stenographer, cutting down the salaries of clerks, (established a long time ago,) whose work has increased many fold, refusing the necessary means for preparing and printing documents, &c.
21. To pay judgments of Court of Claims.	400,000 00	.....	400,000 00	An inexcusable blunder, or naked repudiation. The final judgments of the Court of Claims are as binding upon the honor of the Government as the payment of the public debt. Neither can be denied or delayed without the stain of repudiation. The amount required this year is about $2,000,000. To have appropriated it would have diminished the grand total of pretended savings by that amount. To make a show of saving $400,000 the House bill substantially repudiates $2,000,000. In the partisan scales, by which the items of this bill were weighed, political necessities were more weighty than national honor.
Total	18,902,236 99	$13,392,233 61	*5,510,003 38

* Net reduction from 1876, (1877 over 1876.)

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, for the year ending June 30, 1877, compared with the appropriation for the same purpose for the year ending June 30, 1876.

1. For salaries of ministers to Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia.	$70,000 00	$56,000 00	$14,000 00	In regard to reductions in items one to six inclusive, it need only be stated that they tend to degrade a highly honorable branch of the public service, and to present the country in a most unfavorable light in the eyes of other nations. Our diplomatic officers would thus be placed, as to salary, below the ministers of even some of the weakest nations. It is believed that the salaries provided in the House bill are totally inadequate for proper representatives of the Government in these important positions.
2. Ministers to Spain, Austria, Brazil, Mexico, Japan, and China.	72,000 00	60,000 00	12,000 00
3. Minister to Italy	12,000 00	8,000 00	4,000 00
4. Ministers to Portugal, Switzerland, Belgium, Netherlands, Turkey, and Venezuela.	45,000 00	39,000 00	6,000 00
5. Ministers to Denmark, Sweden, and Norway.	15,000 00	6,500 00	8,500 00
6. Hawaiian Islands	7,500 00	3,500 00	4,000 00

The consular and diplomatic appropriation bill as it passed the House of Representatives, &c.—Continued.

Service for which appropriated.	Appropriated for year ending June 30, 1876.	Appropriated by House bill for year ending June 30, 1877.	Reductions made in House bill.	Remarks upon reductions made in House bill as shown in third column.
7. Chili, Peru, Bolivia, Ecuador, Colombia, Paraguay, Uruguay, and Argentine Republic.	$60,000 00	$19,500 00	$40,500 00	This provides for one minister to Chili and Bolivia, and one minister to Peru, Ecuador, and Colombia. As the principal mode of travel in these countries is on mules, if the ministers attend properly to their offices, they would be obliged to spend a large part of their time in the saddle. It is also believed to be unwise to provide for only one minister for the Argentine Republic, Paraguay, and Uruguay. It would appear that the generally acknowledged importance of advancing our commercial interests with these South American states should have prevented so great a mistake as this. Especially is this true in view of the publication of facts bearing upon this point in official documents of the Government, and in trade journals, as well as of the clearly expressed views of our chief commercial organizations. It would probably be a wise provision to enlarge both our diplomatic and consular service in these countries of South America.
8. Greece	7,500 00	.....	7,500 00	This mission has grown in importance in consequence of late troubles in the East, and should not be abandoned.
9. Guatemala, Costa Rica, Honduras, Salvador, and Nicaragua.	10,000 00	6,500 00	3,500 00	One minister now to these states, and on account of the great expense of travel, it is believed that his salary should not be reduced. A large proportion of his present salary is consumed in the expense of travel.
10. Minister resident and consul-general to Hayti.	7,500 00	.....	7,500 00	It appears to be very unwise to remove this officer, in view of our growing commercial interests in Hayti. The competition of our commercial rivals and the importance of the trade clearly indicate that we should sustain, and not destroy this mission.
11. Minister resident and consul-general to Liberia.	4,000 00	4,000 00	.....
12. Chargés d'affaires ad interim and diplomatic officers abroad.	40,000 00	20,000 00	20,000 00	The law directs that in the absence of the secretaries of legation, the chargés d'affaires shall receive 50 per cent. of their salary. The amount appropriated by House bill will not meet the requirements of the law, and hence this reduction will certainly give rise to a deficiency.
13. Secretaries to legations at Austria, Brazil, Italy, Mexico, and Spain.	9,000 00	9,000 00	.....
14. Secretaries to legations at London, Paris, Berlin, and St. Petersburg	10,500 00	10,500 00	.....
15. Secretary of legation at Japan while acting as interpreter.	5,000 00	3,000 00	2,000 00	Five thousand dollars is not too much for the officer who performs the double duty of secretary of legation and interpreter, as it is exceedingly difficult to find one person competent to fill both places.
16. Second secretaries of legations at Great Britain, France, and Germany.	6,000 00	6,000 00	.....
17. Secretary to legation at China	5,000 00	4,000 00	1,000 00	It is unwise to make this reduction. The compensation now given is not too much for a competent officer.
18. Interpreter to legation at Turkey.	3,000 00	3,000 00	.....
19. Private amanuensis to minister to Great Britain.	2,500 00	2,500 00	.....	Properly omitted this year, as it applied only to General Schenck, from the fact that his right arm was disabled in the late war.
20. For contingent expenses of foreign intercourse proper and of all missions abroad.	100,000 00	50,000 00	50,000 00	Such reduction would certainly give rise to a deficiency. The average expenditure under this head, during the two terms of President Grant, has been about $100,000, and it has been less than during the presidency of Pierce, Buchanan, Lincoln, or Johnson.
21. Consuls-general, consuls, vice-consuls, commercial agents, and consular clerks.	333,200 00	230,400 00	102,800 00	A small reduction might possibly be made, but so large a reduction as this would cripple and degrade the consular service. The consular service yields a large revenue from fees paid by American vessels and seamen at foreign ports. These fees in 1875 amounted to $697,988.49. A part of this amount was allowed for compensation, and a large sum was returned to the Treasury. It appears evident that a service which is a source of net revenue to the Government, and which performs a most important office toward the protection and advancement of our commercial interests abroad, should be firmly sustained by Congress.
22. Agent and consul-general at Cairo	4,000 00	3,000 00	1,000 00
23. Consuls-general at London, Paris, Havana, and Rio Janeiro.	24,000 00	20,000 00	4,000 00
24. Consuls-general at Calcutta and Shanghai.	10,000 00	9,000 00	1,000 00
25. Consul-general at Melbourne	4,500 00	4,000 00	500 00
26. Consuls-general at Kanagawa, Montreal, and Berlin.	12,000 00	10,500 00	1,500 00

30. Clerks at consulates	51,000 00	42,600 00	8,400 00	This reduction would seriously derange the service.
31. Interpreters to various consulates	17,000 00	13,000 00	4,000 00	This should be increased instead of diminished, as it is not possible now to supply the needed interpreters.
32. Consular officers not citizens of the United States.	10,000 00	8,000 00	2,000 00	Perhaps this reduction can be made.
33. Marshals for consular courts in Japan, China, Siam, and Turkey.	7,700 00	7,700 00	.....
34. Interpreters, guards, and expenses at consulates at Constantinople, Smyrna, Candia, Cairo, &c.	3,000 00	3,000 00	.....
35. Loss by exchange on consular service.	48,000 00	10,000 00	38,000 00	A proper reduction. The large amount for last year ($48,000) arose from a mistake made at the Treasury Department.
36. Contingent expenses of United States consulates.	131,850 00	100,000 00	31,850 00	Perhaps this reduction may be made without injury.
37. United States and Spanish claims commission.	15,000 00	10,212 50	4,787 50	A part of this reduction can be made by occupying rooms in the State Department building, but a contingent fund of $1,500 is needed in addition to the amount appropriated by the House.
38. United States and Mexican claims commission.	28,700 00	.....	28,700 00	Rental, fuel, and lights have been saved by taking rooms in the State Department building. Something is needed, however, for translations, messenger, stationery, &c.
39. Rent of prisons for American convicts in Siam and Turkey.	4,000 00	1,600 00	2,400 00	The full amount ($4,000) is absolutely necessary; and, if denied, the State Department will not have the means to discharge a just debt contracted in these countries under the provisions of treaties.
40. Rent of prisons for American convicts in China.	1,500 00	1,300 00	200 00	A magnificent economy!
41. Wages of keepers, care of offenders, and expenses.	10,000 00	8,000 00	2,000 00	This reduction cannot be made. It will probably give rise to a deficiency.
42. Rent of prison for American convicts in Japan.	750 00	650 00	100 00	An absurd reduction.
43. Wages of keepers, care of offenders, and expenses.	5,000 00	4,500 00	500 00	Do.

44. Bringing home from foreign countries persons charged with crimes, &c.	$5,000 00	$3,000 00	$2,000 00	It has been found in the course of years that about this amount is annually required for this purpose. This absurd retrenchment is very likely to expose the United States to contempt abroad, owing to the fact that it may be unable to bring home criminals reclaimed under our extradition treaties.
45. Relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries.	100,000 00	60,000 00	40,000 00	It is found that an average of about $100,000 is required each year for this purpose, and to provide less would be an act of inhumanity to the sailors of our merchant marine. During the year when a large number of whaleships were wrecked in the Arctic Ocean a deficiency of $140,000 arose.
46. Acknowledging services of masters and crews of foreign vessels in rescuing American citizens from shipwreck.	5,000 00	2,500 00	2,500 00	This is a most worthy object, and one recognized by all the principal commercial nations. The awards for such acts are usually watches, chronometers, spy-glasses, and other presents which would naturally be appropriate and be appreciated by a sailor. It has been found that the average amount required for such purposes is about $5,000, and to deny it would be to refuse a proper recognition of acts of heroism and of humanity performed by foreigners in behalf of American seamen.

ARMY BILL.

The Army appropriation bill as it passed the House of Representatives for the year ending June 30, 1877, compared with the appropriations for the same purpose for the year ending June 30, 1876.

Service for which appropriated.	Appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1876.	Appropriated by House bill for the year ending June 30, 1877.	Reductions made in House bill.	Increase in House bill.	Remarks upon reductions made in House bill, as shown in third column.
1. Expenses Commanding General's Office.	$5,000 00	$2,000 00	$3,000 00	.....	Since the removal of headquarters to Washington the expenses are reduced by this amount.
2. Expenses recruiting, &c.	105,000 00	75,000 00	30,000 00	.....	This reduction might possibly have been made but for the Indian war. It will undoubtedly call for a deficiency, in view of the larger number to be recruited.
3. Contingent, Adjutant General's	3,000 00	3,000 00	.....	.....
4. Signal service of the Army	12,500 00	10,500 00	2,000 00	.....	A small saving, from which it is probable no injury will result.
5. Pay of the Army	11,400,000 00	11,771,052 50	.....	$371,052 50	The appropriation by House bill was in view of the contemplated reduction of the Army from 25,000 to 22,000, and was larger in proportion than that of last year. The amount appropriated last year was $11,400,000, but a deficiency was required, and subsequently appropriated of $665,000, making a total of $12,065,000. There would, therefore, have been a deficiency this year of $293,947 if the conference committee had not increased the amount of House bill. Hence this item is not even a reduction.
6. Subsistence of the Army	2,484,330 00	1,908,686 00	575,644 00	.....	The entire amount appropriated last year was required for the service, and this reduction would simply give rise to a deficiency to be supplied at the next session of Congress.
7. Supplies Quartermaster's Department.	4,250,000 00	3,360,667 93	889,332 07	.....	This, and the next six items, down to and including "National Cemeteries," constitute the appropriations for the Quartermaster-General's Department, and may be considered together. The total for the service last year was $12,950,000. The total by House bill $8,530,000, showing a reduction of $4,419,162. The letter already read, from the Quartermaster-General to the Secretary of War clearly shows this to be a deficiency and not a saving. It will be seen that the revised estimate, based upon the lowest possible reduction, and contemplating a deficiency next winter, was $11,525,000. The House bill arbitrarily cut this down, exclusive of re-appropriated balances, $2,024,162. There is not a shadow of doubt that a deficiency of at least $2.500 000 will be required next winter, and very likely it will be much larger.
8. Incidental expenses, Quartermaster's Department.	1,200,000 00	800,000 00	400,000 00	.....
9. Horses for cavalry, &c.	300,000 00	104,784 89	195,215 11	.....
10. Transportation of the Army	4,000,000 00	2,817,804 65	1,182,195 35	.....
11. Hire of quarters	1,500,000 00	877,865 52	622,134 48	.....
12. Clothing, camp equipage, &c	1,450,000 00	383,221 21	1,066,778 79	.....
13. National cemeteries	150,000 00	125,000 00	25,000 00	.....
14. Construction and repair of hospitals	100,000 00	61,494 42	38,505 58	.....	This is simply deferring the construction of necessary hospitals.
15. Army contingencies	100,000 00	50,000 00	50,000 00	.....	If all the specific appropriations were sufficient, there appears to be no doubt but that this reduction could be made.
16. Medical and hospital supplies	200,000 00	160,000 00	40,000 00	.....	The reduction here made will simply give rise to a deficiency to be supplied at the next session of Congress, or a very much larger amount in the regular appropriation bill in order to renew the depleted stock of medical supplies.
17. Army Medical Museum	10,000 00	10,000 00	.....	.....
18. Engineers' depot, Willet's Point	9,000 00	5,000 00	4,000 00	.....	Reduced by estimates of the Department, not by House of Representatives.
19. Torpedo experiments	10,000 00	.....	10,000 00	.....	This is simply a refusal to make appropriation for a very important military object, and one fully recognized and liberally provided for by other governments.
20. Ordnance service	125,000 00	100,000 00	25,000 00	.....	The effect of this reduction is to cripple the service. The supply was very nearly exhausted last year, and the Secretary of War estimated for $200,000 this year, and stated that such amount was absolutely necessary.
21. Metallic ammunition for small arms	75,000 00	50,000 00	25,000 00	.....	This will give rise to a deficiency at next session of Congress, as the amount appropriated is not sufficient for target practice, no provision being made for requirements of the Indian war.
22. Ordnance stores at arsenal	50,000 00	30,000 00	20,000 00	.....	Perhaps a proper reduction.
23. Ordnance stores in hands of troops, &c.	25,000 00	35,000 00	.....	10,000 00	An increase.
24. Saddlers' tools, &c., cavalry service.	20,000 00	.....	20,000 00	.....	Probably the postponement of a necessary expenditure.
25. Ordnance stores to fill requisitions for troops and carriages in use at sea-coast forts.	100,000 00	100,000 00	.....	.....
26. Infantry, cavalry, and artillery equipments.	100,000 00	90,000 00	10,000 00	.....	Possibly a saving, probably a deficiency.

27. Manufacture at national armories of new breech-loading muskets and carbines.	$150,000 00	$100,000 00	$50,000 00	.....	This is merely a refusal to provide for a necessary branch of the public service, and it will involve the discharge of 150 skilled mechanics at the national armory whose places will be difficult to fill hereafter.
28. Surgical appliances for disabled soldiers not heretofore provided for.	.....	5,000 00	.....	$5,000 00	A necessary increase.

NAVAL BILL.

The naval appropriation bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, for the year ending June 30, 1877, compared with the appropriations for the same purpose for the year ending June 30, 1876.

Service for which appropriated.	Appropriated for year ending June 30, 1876.	Appropriated by House bill for year ending June 30, 1877.	Reductions made in House bill.	Increase in House bill.	Remarks upon reductions made in House bill as shown in third column.
1. Pay of he Navy	$6,250,000 00	$5,750,000 00	$500,000 00	.....	A deficiency. The deficit to be supplied next session will be much larger than the pretended reduction. "The estimate for $7,600,000 was made by close computation and examination of the rolls, both in the Fourth Auditor's Office and the Navy Department. The appropriations for the last three years have been too small to make the payments required by existing laws. The deficit has only been made up by balances of appropriations for pay, available for this purpose; all these that can be legally used are now exhausted."—(Note accompanying estimates.) The deficiency will therefore be $1,850,000, unless some expedient can be devised to diminish it. The two propositions suggested to that end, are: First, the reduction of force in the Navy from 8,500 to 7,500 as provided in the House bill. Second, that the officers be "furloughed." The reduction of the number of men will not materially reduce the expenditure this year, because, as the men are enlisted for three years, and only paid off at the end of their term, the same amount will be required for their pay during the fiscal year 1877 as for the last year, the effect of the reduction of force not being felt until the terms of enlistment during the current year are expiring. Therefore, no diminution of the large deficiency can be hoped for by the reduction of force. Should all the officers now on leave, and those that could probably be relieved from duty, be "furloughed," as suggested by the second proposition, there would be a saving of only $408,700, which, deducted from the $1,850,000 required, would still leave a deficiency of $1,441,300. "Furloughing" an officer means reducing his pay to one-half of the "leave-pay," and is only done as a punishment. It is not likely that so sweeping a punishment as this will be inflicted on the gallant officers of our Navy, and therefore a deficiency of from $1,200,000 to $1,400,000 is absolutely certain. All these facts were known when the House bill was passed, and hence this large deficiency was intentional.
2. Contingent expenses of the Navy Department.	100,000 00	80,000 00	20,000 00	.....	This is consistent with the general curtailment of the naval service. If it be expedient to impair the efficiency of the Navy as proposed by House bill, this appropriation is ample. Probably a part of the reduction was judicious, whether other changes were made or not.
3. Civil establishment at the various navy-yards and stations.	158,000 00	85,000 00	73,000 00	.....	This reduction, like the last, results from and is consistent with the general policy of withholding appropriations adequate to provide the ordinary means of national defense, and is to be classed with those items. Some reduction in the "civil establishment" might be judiciously made, but not one so radical and sweeping as this.
3½. Commission to report on the abandonment of navy-yards.	.....	2,000 00	.....	$2,000 00
BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.
4. Pilotage and towage of ships of war.	50,000 00	45,000 00	5,000 00	.....	Curtailment of the service. As so many ships will be withdrawn from the service for lack of sufficient appropriations to keep them afloat, this reduction is consistent with rest of the bill.
5. Correcting compasses, &c	3,000 00	3,000 00	.....	.....
6. Nautical instruments	10,000 00	9,000 00	1,000 00	.....	Possibly a saving.
7. Books for ships of war	3,000 00	3,000 00	.....	.....
8. Navy signals and apparatus	6,000 00	6,000 00	.....	.....
9. Compass fittings	5,000 00	3,000 00	2,000 00	.....	This reduction will probably compel the bureau to resort to old obsolete binnacles, some of which are yet on hand. A very small and injudicious saving.
10. Logs and leads for measuring and sounding.	3,000 00	3,000 00	.....	.....
11. Lanterns, lamps, &c	5,000 00	5,000 00	.....	.....
12. Bunting and flags	5,000 00	5,000 00	.....	.....
13. Oil, candles, wicks, &c	20,000 00	16,000 00	4,000 00	.....	A deficiency. The estimate of $20,000 was based upon $1 per gallon for oil, while, during the past six months, the price was from $1.13 to $1.34.
14. Stationery for officers and courts-martial.	2,000 00	2,000 00	.....	.....

15. Musical instruments and music for vessels of war.	$1,000 00	$1,000 00	.....	.....
16. Steering signals and indicators, gongs, &c.	2,500 00	2,000 00	$500 00	.....	Possibly a saving.
17. Contingent expenses Bureau of Navigation.	4,000 00	3,000 00	1,000 00	.....	Probably a judicious reduction.
18. Drawing, printing, &c., charts, sailing directions, &c.	60,000 00	50,000 00	10,000 00	.....	Postponed. This reduction will delay the publication of charts, &c., very much needed. At best, it is but a postponement.
19. Fuel, lights, office-furniture, &c.	5,000 00	5,000 00	.....	.....
20. Rent and repair of building	2,800 00	2,800 00	.....	.....
NAVAL OBSERVATORY.
21. Assistants and clerk	6,300 00	6,100 00	200 00	.....	An immense economy!
22. Wages, fuel, light, &c	10,000 00	10,000 00	.....	.....
23. Reducing and transcribing astronomical observations.	1,200 00	2,200 00	.....	$1,000 00	An increase.
24. Expenses of Nautical Almanac	20,000 00	15,000 00	5,000 00	.....	A mere curtailment, not a saving. Any surplus of Nautical Almanacs over the actual necessities of the Navy are sold at cost, hence their publication is a public convenience and no loss to the Government.
25. Reducing observations of transit of Venus.	3,000 00	.....	3,000 00	.....	Observations were taken at various and remote parts of the globe, and at great expense. Withholding the means of preparing them for publication is simply denying the benefits of said expenditures.
26. Continuance of work on new planets	3,000 00	3,000 00	.....	.....
27. Rent, fuel, labor, &c	1,500 00	1,500 00	.....	.....
BUREAU OF ORDNANCE.
28. Fuel, tools, materials, &c., for yards and stations.	75,000 00	50,000 00	25,000 00	.....	This can be supplemented by using materials on hand, which, though unsuitable, may be converted at cost of extra labor. It is, therefore, to some extent a saving.
29. Labor at navy-yards	250,000 00	125,000 00	125,000 00	.....	Curtailment. This reduction is at cost of efficiency to its whole extent, and is consistent with the policy of the House bills in crippling the Navy in order to make political capital by pretended economy. As it results from withholding means necessary for preservation and repairs of vessels, it must be classed with those items.
30. Repairs of buildings, boats, wharves, &c.	10,000 00	10,000 00	.....	.....
31. Miscellaneous items	5,000 00	3,000 00	2,000 00	.....
32. For the torpedo corps	12,000 00	6,000 00	6,000 00		Withheld, not saved. The torpedo-service compensates, somewhat, a deficiency in number and power of ships, and the reduction is, to its whole extent, a loss of efficiency. It is, however, entirely consistent with the general policy of the House bills, which aim to strike down or impair every existing means of national protection. An examination of all these bills will show that the heaviest blows have almost invariably fallen upon the defensive service of the country.
33. Electrical apparatus, &c	15,000 00	5,000 00	10,000 00
34. Copper, iron, &c., for torpedoes	25,000 00	15,000 00	10,000 00	.....
35. Torpedo-boats, &c	25,000 00	.....	25,000 00
36. Labor of various kinds	15,000 00	10,000 00	5,000 00
37. Repair of wharves, &c.	1,000 00	2,000 00	.....	1,000 00
38. Contingent expenses of ordnance service.	1,000 00	1,000 00	.....	.....
BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT AND RECRUITING.
39. Equipment of vessels	1,250,000 00	970,000 00	280,000 00	.....	Curtailment of service. In view of the reduction of force, and the withholding of necessary appropriations for repairs and preservation of vessels, and the necessarily reduced number of vessels in commission, it is probable the amount appropriated will be adequate. The "saving," if any, results from the general policy of crippling the Navy, so consistently pursued throughout the entire bill.
40. Contingent expenses of bureau	75,000 00	75,000 00	.....	.....
BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS.
41. General maintenance of yards and docks.	760,000 00	440,000 00	320,000 00	.....	This bureau has charge of all the buildings, wharves, piers, dry-docks, floating-docks, sheers, cranes, fire apparatus, watchmen, teamsters, horses, oxen, &c., at all the navy-yards. This reduction is consistent with the theory of the House bills—that, for the sake of making a show of economy, our navy-yards are to be partially closed and our ships to await repairs until after the election.
42. Contingent expenses at navy-yards and stations.	40,000 00	20,000 00	20,000 00	.....	This saving results from the general curtailment of the service, and belongs with the same class as the one last mentioned.
43. At the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia.	52,973 00	52,973 00	.....	.....
BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY.
44. Surgeons' necessaries for vessels, navy-yards, Marine Corps, and Coast Survey.	30,000 00	30,000 00	.....	.....
45. Repair of naval hospitals and naval laboratory.	20,000 00	10,000 00	10,000 00	.....	Postponed. Probably a deficiency next session. The sum appropriated by the House bill is known to be entirely insufficient. Seven large hospitals and the naval laboratory have to be kept in good order and repair out of this appropriation. The sum found imperatively necessary for many years has ranged from twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars. Five thousand of the $10,000 appropriated will be needed at once at the Chelsea (Massachusetts) hospital, in order to place the steam-heating apparatus in a safe and efficient condition. At best it is only a postponement, for repairs not made this year must be next.
46. Civil establishment of hospitals	35,000 00	25,000 00	10,000 00	.....	Withheld from a necessary service and at the cost of safety and comfort to the patients. The sum appropriated last year was entirely inadequate to the service. There was no reason whatever for the reduction, except the political necessity of making a large pretended saving on last year's appropriations. The health, safety, and comfort of patients, for whom the Government is bound to provide, were not considered.

47. Contingent expenses of bureau	$25,000 00	$15,000 00	$10,000 00	.....	This item, like the last, is also merely withheld at the cost of necessary comforts and care, to which the sick of the Navy are fairly entitled. The appropriation for many years has been $25,000.
BUREAU OF PROVISIONS AND CLOTHING.
48. Provisions for the Navy.....	1,244,000 00	930,000 00	314,000 00	.....	Deficiency. On January 1, 1876, there were 8,500 men, 1,209 pay officers, and 1,152 marines on duty entitled to a ration. Reducing the number of pay officers and marines in same proportion as men, from 8,500 to 7,500 men, leaves 9,566 rations at 30 cents to be provided, amounting to $1,047,477, which leaves a deficiency of $117,477 without taking into the account the waste in issue of provisions, the increased cost abroad, and the expenses of the bureau in the several inspections and warehouses. For these "expenses" $97,832.26 was paid last year. Adding the expenses for inspections and warehouses to the deficiency for rations, makes a total deficiency of $215,309, which will certainly be called for next session. The inevitable waste, losses, contingencies, and increased cost abroad will, in all probability, swell the deficiency to the entire amount of pretended reduction.
49. Water for ships.....	35,000 00	25,000 00	10,000 00	.....	The sum of $15,615.24 was paid for water during the six months ending January 1, 1876. A deficiency of nearly the whole reduction is probable.
50. Contingent expenses...	60,000 00	35,000 00	15,000 00	.....	A deficiency. A carefully prepared estimate, made by the bureau since the passage of the bill, shows that there will necessarily be a deficiency of $17,500.
BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.
51. Preservation of vessels.....	3,300,000 00	1,500,000 00	1,800,000 00	.....	An effort to paralyze the system of national defenses. The effect of this reduction will be to increase the cost of repairs another year, by an amount which cannot now be estimated. The repairs must and will be made, and hence this reduction is only a postponement with increased cost as the penalty. Another result will be to stop necessary repairs on some eight or ten iron-clads and other vessels, and to greatly impair the efficiency of our Navy. It is not economy, but a reckless blow struck at one of the most important means of national protection.
52. Protection of timber-lands	5,000 00	.....	5,000 00	.....	The effect of this omission will be to expose the live-oak timber lands to depredation, the amount of which cannot be estimated.
BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING.
53. Repairs of machinery, oil, coal, &c..	1,800,000 00	885,000 00	915,000 00	.....	"The results of this reduction of the amounts required for steam engineering must necessarily stop all work upon the double-turreted monitors, cause the almost total suspension of work in the several navy-yards for repairs and refitting of machinery of vessels required for sea service, and render it impossible to repair, to any great extent, the machinery, &c., of any vessel or vessels in service, that may hereafter break down through unforeseen casualties, or the ordinary wear and tear of service." (Extract from statement by the Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering.)
NAVAL ACADEMY.
54. Pay of professors and others	58,826 00	55,526 00	3,300 00	.....

MARINE CORPS.
61. Pay of officers, privates, &c., and to discharged soldiers, for clothing undrawn.	624,760 00	624,000 00	760 00	....	The estimate was $4,785 greater than last year, and the reason therefor given; but as almost every item must be reduced, whether any reason existed or not, this small amount was shaved off merely for the sake of shaving.
62. Provisions	100,000 00	90,000 00	10,000 00	.....	Possibly a legitimate reduction.
63. Clothing	100,000 00	80,000 00	20,000 00	.....	$11,130 of this reduction is attributable to Department estimates. The balance was merely arbitrary.
64. Fuel	30,856 00	215,000 00	5,856 00	.....	$2,204 of this reduction was made by Department estimates. The balance is merely arbitrary.
65. Military stores	9,000 00	5,000 00	4,000 00	.....	Possibly a saving.
66. Transportation and recruiting.....	5,000 00	5,000 00	.....	.....
67. Repair of barracks and rent of offices	10,000 00	5,000 00	5,000 00	.....	$15,000 was needed this year. The reduction is only a postponement.
68. Forage for horses	5,000 00	5,000 00	.....	.....

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

The Military Academy appropriation bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, for the year ending June 20, 1877, compared with the appropriations for the same purpose for the year ending June 30, 1876.

Service for which appropriated.	Appropriated for year ending June 30, 1876.	Appropriated by House bill for year ending June 30, 1877.	Reductions made in House bill.	Increase in House bill.	Remarks upon reductions made in House bill as shown in third column.
1. For pay of instructors, professors, cadets, and musicians.	$235,000 00	$201,296 00	$33,704 00	.....	This reduction is effected as follows: First, by omitting to appropriate the salaries provided by law and abolishing the band, $33,700; secondly, by omitting to provide for necessary sewerage, $13,500; thirdly, by omitting amounts necessary for continuing construction of hospital, which is very much needed for health of cadets, and which is up to first story. The amount thus postponed until next year is $30,000. Fourthly, an item of $8,000 was appropriated last year for building school-house. Having been completed by that appropriation, nothing was needed this year. The balance of the reduction, amounting to $20,409, is made up of many small sums shaved off from every item in the bill. Some of these "shavings" may be proper—many of them are arbitrary and absurd.
2. For repairs, improvements, and labor.	22,500 00	12,000 00	10,500 00	.....
3. For fuel and miscellaneous	21,700 00	21,500 00	200 00	.....

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

The sundry civil appropriation bill as it passed the House of Representatives for the year ending June 30, 1877, compared with the appropriations for the same purpose for the year ending June 30, 1876.

[N. B.—Those numbers in the fourth column marked thus *, show an increase for the current fiscal year, and are to be deducted.]

Service for which appropriated.	Appropriated for year ending June 30, 1876.	Appropriated by House bill for year ending June 30, 1877.	Reductions made in House bill.	Remarks upon reductions made in House bill as shown in third column.
1. Payments to widows of members of Congress.	.....	$8,191 75	*$8,191 75	An increase.
2. Miscellaneous: To pay estate of Henry Wilson, late Vice-President of the United States, and to pay attorneys at law, temporary clerks, messengers, watchmen, folders, laborers, detectives, and stenographers.	.....	47,450 05	*47,450 05
3. Botanical garden	6,450 00	3,500 00	2,950 00	Possibly a saving; probably only a postponement.
4. Public printing and binding	.....	1,129,977 50	.....	Deficiency: This reduction means a deficiency to be supplied at next session, beyond a doubt. The actual expenses of the printing-office last year were over $1,600,000. They will be largely increased this year by the vast amount of printing required by the thirty-three committees of investigation ordered by the House of Representatives. The entire amount of pretended reduction will re-appear in a deficiency bill next session as certainly as a $1,600,000 of printing cannot be done for $1,134,000. It was doubtless so understood when the House bill was passed.
5. Lithographing and mapping for the Supreme Court.	.....	2,000 00	.....
6. Printing and binding laws of Idaho	.....	2,128 00	.....
Total printing and binding	1,665,507 66	1,134,105 50	531,402 16
7. District of Columbia: Fire Department.	.....	25,000 00	*25,000 00	An increase.
8. Inspector and assistant inspector of gas and gas-meters.	3,000 00	1,500 00	1,500 00	Possibly a "saving." Probably the cause of increased gas-bills.
9. Treasury Department: Life-saving and life-boat stations.	241,580 00	237,460 00	4,120 00	Probably a proper reduction.

The sundry civil appropriation bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, &c.—Continued.

Service for which appropriated.	Appropriated for year ending June 30, 1876.	Appropriated by House bill for year ending June 30, 1877.	Reductions made in House bill.	Remarks upon reductions made by House bill as shown in third column.
10. Revenue-cutter service	$1,027,883 40	$747,647 19	$280,236 21	A mutilated service. This is an arbitrary, unreasonable, and dangerous curtailment of a most important and economical service, employed in protecting the revenues of the Government against frauds. The loss of revenue from thus crippling the right arm of the Treasury will probably be many times greater than the pretended saving effected by the reduction.
11. Judiciary	3,105,200 00	2,589,000 00	516,200 00	A deficiency. The amount appropriated last year was required, and the same amount was estimated for and will be required this year. The House bill contained a clause repealing the act passed to prevent frauds and intimidation at elections. It was probably contemplated that the omission to guard the purity of the ballot-box would result in a saving of money as well as a democratic victory, and hence the reduction. But as that act will not be repealed, a deficiency is certain.
12. Government Hospital for the Insane.	183,928 46	155,000 00	28,928 46	This "reduction" is effected by refusing appropriations indispensably necessary for repairs of the buildings and support of the institution, and which will have to be appropriated next session. It is, therefore, only postponed, not "saved."
13. Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb.	88,000 00	88,000 00	Nothing
14. Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-In Asylum, and other charities.	144,300 00	126,000 00	18,300 00	Reduced by a partial withdrawal of the Government from the charities which it has undertaken to support in the District of Columbia.
15. Smithsonian Institution	32,500 00	8,000 00	24,500 00	Reduced by refusing to the Smithsonian Institution the means of preserving and taking care of a large and valuable collection, which has been gathered from all parts of the world. A very doubtful "economy."
16. Detecting and bringing to punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Government notes, bonds, and coins, and for detecting other frauds upon the Government.	125,000 00	100,000 00	25,000 00	"Saved," and will, doubtless, meet the approval of all the counterfeiters and thieves of the country, who will cordially indorse this kind of "economy," as an illustration of broad and liberal statesmanship.
17. Compensation in lieu of moieties under customs laws.	200,000 00	125,000 00	75,000 00	Possibly a saving.
18. Reform School of District of Columbia.	10,000 00	10,000 00
19. Metropolitan Police	205,270 00	150,000 00	55,270 00	Possibly a saving.
20. Public buildings under the Treasury Department.	5,132,893 99	2,431,500 00	2,701,393 99	Postponed. This large reduction is in no sense a "saving" to the Government. The buildings are all in process of construction, and as there will be ample funds in the Treasury for the purpose, a wise discretion would dictate an appropriation large enough to continue the works economically, especially at this time, when labor and materials are so cheap and when there is so great a demand for employment. At best it is only a postponement until after the election, and may answer a double purpose: First, to reduce the aggregate of the appropriation bills and prove democratic "economy;" secondly, to throw large numbers of workingmen out of employment, and by increasing the distress of the people, convinced them of the necessity for a change of administration.
21. Light-House Establishment—maintenance.	1,899,000 00	2,008,600 00	*109,600 00	An increase.
22. Construction of light-houses, beacons, and fog-signals.	915,400 00	330,200 00	585,200 00	Postponed. The amount of appropriation by the House bill is known to be wholly inadequate to the maintenance, repairs, and preservation of existing light-houses, beacons, &c., and to the construction of such new ones as are indispensable to the safety of our commerce, and to the protection of life and property. But commerce and human life are not considered so important as small appropriations for this year, and hence these safeguards must be postponed until after the election.
23. Armories and arsenals	552,165 00	189,175 00	362,990 00	The same principle which has substantially surrendered our forts, crippled our navy, refused to provide torpedoes or any other means of defense, has dictated the reduction in this case. Armories and arsenals must wait until after the election, when appropriations will be made to meet the deficiency of this year.
24. Surveys of northern and northwestern lakes and Mississippi River.	150,000 00	100,000 00	50,000 00	Postponed. No one doubts that these surveys should be, and will be, completed. The wants of commerce require it, but commerce must wait until after November; political exigences are considered more imperative than commercial necessities.
25. Buildings and grounds in and around Washington.	234,250 00	144,500 00	9,750 00	A portion of this reduction may prove a "saving," but it is more probable that the appropriations for this purpose next session will have to be increased nearly if not quite to the extent of the reduction.
26. Work on Capitol and for general care and repairs thereof.	50,000 00	60,000 00	*10,000 00	An increase.
27. For improving Capitol grounds	200,000 00	100,000 00	100,000 00	Postponed. The improvement of the Capitol grounds has been commenced upon a general plan which everybody understands will be carried out. It may be proper to postpone for this year, but it is in no sense a "saving" of money. The nation's self-respect will not permit the grounds to remain in their present unfinished condition.
28. Annual repairs of Interior Department building.		5,000 00	*5,000 00	Increase.
29. Repairs of court-house building, Washington.		2,000 00	*2,000 00	Increase.
30. Buildings and grounds under Agricultural Department.	11,990 00	6,450 00	5,540 00	Possibly a "saving," though it is probable that a considerable portion of the work, having been completed last year, did not need another appropriation.
31. Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and expenses of national currency and national loan.	1,878,000 00	1,038,000 00	840,000 00	This "reduction" is due to the substitution of silver coin for fractional currency. No part of it can be credited to the greater "economy" of this Congress.
32. Coast Survey	869,600 00	643,000 00	226,600 00	Postponed. The above remarks with reference to the surveys of the southwestern lakes will apply to this item. At best it is but a postponement of work which must be done, and paid for hereafter.
33. Inquiries respecting food-fishes, propagation of food-fishes, and illustrations for reports on food-fishes.	53,500 00	36,000 00	17,500 00	A very doubtful economy, which withholds from a work of great value to all parts of the country the means necessary to its greatest success. It may, however, be called a "saving," and upon the same principle the whole amount might have been "saved."
34. Metric standard of weights and measures.		8,000 00	*8,000 00
35. Rent No. 215 South Capitol street		400 00	*400 00
36. Rent No. 205 New Jersey avenue		1,000 00	*1,000 00
37. Fuel and lights		300 00	*300 00
38. Supplies of all kinds required by janitors and firemen for all buildings under control of the Treasury Department.	300,000 00	300,000 00
39. For furniture and carpets, and repairs of the same, in all buildings under control of the Treasury Department.	150,000 00	75,000 00	75,000 00	Possibly the somewhat liberal appropriation of last year may have furnished a supply which will partially justify this reduction.

The sundry civil appropriation bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, &c.—Continued.

Service for which appropriated.	Appropriated for year ending June 30, 1876.	Appropriated by House bill for year ending June 30, 1877.	Reductions made in House bill.	Remarks upon reductions made in House bill as shown in third column.
40. For heating, ventilating, and hoisting apparatus, and repairs of same, for all buildings under control of the Treasury Department.	$200,000 00	$100,000 00	$100,000 00	Postponed. The amount required for these purposes is well known, and must be paid. This pretended "reduction" will appear in the "deficiency" for next session.
41. For pay of custodians and janitors of all public buildings under control of the Treasury Department.	100,000 00	50,000 00	50,000 00	A "saving" which will probably be more than counterbalanced by the damage to public buildings from want of proper care.
42. For vaults, safes, and locks, and repair of same, for all buildings under control of the Treasury Department.	75,000 00	50,000 00	25,000 00	A "saving," but one of doubtful economy, and one which will swell the appropriations after the exigency in November shall have passed.
43. For photographing, engraving, and printing plans for all public buildings under control of the Treasury Department.	5,000 00	3,000 00	2,000 00	Probably proper reduction.
44. For photolithographing, engraving, and printing map of the United States and Territories.	6,000 00	2,500 00	3,500 00	Do.
45. Signal-Office, War Department.....	503,000 00	345,000 00	158,000 00	A denial of adequate provision for a service of daily increasing importance to the commercial and agricultural interests of the country, which may result in damage to those interests many times greater than the reduction.
46. Collection and payment of bounty, prize-money, and other claims of colored soldiers and sailors.	75,000 00	.....	75,000 00	A note to the estimates shows that $75,000 will be absolutely required for this year. The House appropriated an "unexpended balance" of $56,235, not naming the amount. Consequently this appears to be a reduction of $75,000, when in fact there is only an actual reduction of $21,765, and even that will probably have to be supplied next winter.
47. Costs and charges of State penitentiaries.	40,000 00	40,000 00	.....
48. Publication of the official records of the rebellion.	50,000 00	40,000 00	10,000 00	Possibly a saving.
49. Support of National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.	.....	318,733 44	*318,733 44	Increase.
50. Completion of soldiers' monument at central branch of National Military Home.	.....	2,000 00	*2,000 00	Do.
51. Support of Leavenworth military prison.	.....	61,688 15	*61,688 15	Do.
58. Protection of river-banks at Fort Brown, Texas.	.....	10,000 00	*10,000 00	An increase.
59. To pay John Titus, late chief-justice of Arizona Territory.	.....	658 80	*658 80	Do.
60. For geological and geographical surveys of the Territories of the United States, by Prof. F. V. Hayden.	75,000 00	65,000 00	10,000 00	Probably a saving.
61. For completion of the geographical and geological surveys of the Territories of the United States, by J. W. Powell.	25,000 00	30,000 00	*5,000 00	An increase.
62. Black Hills survey under Prof. J. W. Jenney.	.....	14,000 00	*14,000 00	Do.
63. For surveys of public lands, surveyors-general and their clerks, fuel, rent, &c.	958,790 00	311,400 00	647,390 00	Postponed. The public lands of this country must be surveyed. Appropriations denied this year will have to be made hereafter. Hence this amount is only postponed.
64. For expenses of collection of revenue from sales of public lands.	601,640 00	423,658 21	177,981 79	Postponed. These "expenses" are about the same each year, and are easily ascertained. This "reduction" upon the amount required last year will doubtless appear in the deficiency bill for next session.
65. For expenses connected with the sale of the United States arsenal property at Dearbornville, Mich.	.....	1,000 00	*1,000 00	An increase.
66. For maps of the geographical and geological surveys of the Territories.	40,000 00	.....	40,000 00	The surveys have been made at great expense, and of course the maps will be published hereafter; hence the necessary appropriation for that purpose is only postponed.
67. For collecting of mining and mineral statistics, under Prof. R. W. Raymond.	15,000 00	.....	15,000 00	The work having been completed and paid for last year, needed no appropriation this year, and therefore this item is neither a "reduction" nor a "saving."
68. For completion of jail in District of Columbia.	140,057 93	.....	140,057 93	Same remarks as that to last item.
69. For fence around jail, heating-apparatus, kitchen-utensils, wash-room apparatus, and driving-engine.	45,491 00	.....	45,491 00	Same remarks.
70. Safe for disbursing-clerk of Interior Department.	2,000 00	.....	2,000 00	Do.
71. Furniture and repair of capitol building of Washington Territory.	5,274 75	.....	5,274 75	Do.
72. Engraving and printing Centennial stock certificates for International Exhibition.	30,750 00	.....	30,750 00	Do.
73. To pay crippled and disabled soldiers now in the employment of the Doorkeeper of the House.	12,549 60	.....	12,549 60	Provided for in the legislative bill, and hence not a "saving."
74. Copies of summary reports of Commissioners of Claims.	1,000 00	.....	1,000 00	Paid for last year, and hence no appropriation necessary this.
75. Monuments in the Congressional Cemetery to deceased Senators and Representatives.	1,500 00	.....	1,500 00	Same remark as that with reference to last item.
76. Noiseless steam-pump for House of Representatives.	1,000 00	.....	1,000 00	Do.
77. Temporary clerks in the Treasury Department.	60,000 00	.....	60,000 00	Omitted this year, but inserted in legislative, executive, and judicial bill; hence no "saving."
78. Salaries and traveling-expenses of agents at seal-fisheries in Alaska.	13,350 00	.....	13,350 00	Not a saving, but a service omitted which should have been provided for.
79. Examination of rebel archives.....	6,000 00	.....	6,000 00	A saving of $6,000, which may result in great losses to the Government. These archives have furnished the means of preventing the payment of claims against the United States amounting to millions of dollars. Their further examination is imperatively required.
80. First installment to Miss Vinnie Ream for statue of Admiral Farragut.	5,000 00	.....	5,000 00	No appropriation required this year.

The sundry civil appropriation bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, &c.—Continued.

Service for which appropriated.	Appropriated for year ending June 30, 1876.	Appropriated by House bill for year ending June 30, 1877.	Reductions made in House bill.	Remarks apon reductions made in House bill as shown in third column.
81. To pay on behalf of the United States as a portion of the general expenses of the District of Columbia.	$1,060,000 00	.....	$1,060,000 00	The refusal to pay anything this year is simply the repudiation of a national obligation to deal justly and fairly with the District of Columbia. The United States own half the property in the District, which is not subject to taxation, and therefore the Government should contribute a fair proportion. Five hundred thousand dollars would have been a fair proportion this year.
82. To pay interest on 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia.	185,000 00	.....	185,000 00	If the contribution mentioned in last remarks had been made, it would have been proper to withhold this for the current year.
83. To defray expenses of the sanitary service of the District of Columbia.	26,117 50	$15,920 00	10,257 00	A curtailment of service probably at the cost of proper provision for the health of the city. Some reduction might properly have been made, but not so large as this.
84. To enable Secretary of the Treasury to repay to collector of customs of the district of Champlain amount of judgment.	684 10	.....	684 10	Neither a "reduction" nor a "saving." Having been paid last year, this Congress was not required to pay again.
85. To pay Charles Morgan for general average on ship Alabama.	3,000 00	.....	3,000 00	Same remark as that with reference to last item.
86. Works of art for ornamenting Capitol.	15,000 00	.....	15,000 00	Same remark.
87. To pay Thomas J. Durant for revision of laws of District of Columbia.	3,300 00	.....	3,300 00	Do.
88. Rent of rooms corner Pennsylvania avenue and Twentieth street, Washington.	1,666 66	.....	1,666 66	Do.
89. Repair of Post-Office building, heating-apparatus, &c.	106,000 00	.....	106,000 00	Do.
90. Thirty thousand copies of United States Official Postal Guide.	20,000 00	.....	20,000 00	Omitted in House bill, but provided for in conference.
91. Rent of buildings and grounds at Peking, China.	5,000 00	.....	5,000 00	A refusal to pay rent contracted for under authority of law.
92. To pay clerk to Committee on Private Land-Claims of the Senate.	2,220 00	.....	2,220 00	Omitted in this bill, but inserted in the legislative bill in conference.
93. Stable for use of Senate	10,000 00	.....	10,000 00	Neither a "reduction" nor a "saving." The stable was built and paid for last year.
94. Repairs of steam-boilers and steam-traps for Senate wing.	3,500 00	.....	3,500 00	Repairs made and paid for last year. Furnishes no ground for comparison of relative economy between the bills of last year and this.
95. To settle accounts of Binger Herman.	545 77	.....	545 77	Account settled and paid last year; hence item not fairly credited to economy of present Congress.
96. To pay contestants for seats in the House of Representatives.	27,100 18	.....	27,100 18	The item for similar expense will be quite as great this year.
97. To pay Bryant & Rogers, architects.	600 00	.....	600 00	Having been paid last year, the House of Representatives are entitled to no credit for not paying a second time.
98. Expenses of commissioner of international penitentiary congress.	8,000 00	.....	8,000 00	Not used; consequently no saving.
99. To pay States for expenses incurred by the war.	250,000 00	.....	250,000 00	Neither a "reduction" nor a "saving." Having been been paid for last year, Congress was not called upon to pay again.
100. Claims of Dakota volunteer forces.	33,980 30	.....	33,980 30	Same remark.
101. Military prison at Fort Leavenworth.	100,000 00	.....	100,000 00	Do
102. To pay volunteers of Oregon and of Washington Territory.	25,000 00	.....	25,000 00	Do.
103. Grading streets and sidewalk in front of United States Arsenal at Indianapolis, Ind.	1,672 99	.....	1,672 99	Do.
104. Completion of military road from Santa Fé to Ferdinandos de Toas, N. Mex.	6,644 80	.....	6,644 80	Do.
105. Purchase of sites for forts in Texas.	45,000 00	.....	45,000 00	Do.
106. Pedestal for statute of General McPherson.	25,000 00	.....	25,000 00	Do.
107. Brady collection of photographs of the war.	25,000 00	.....	25,000 00	Do.
108. Navy-yards and stations	1,250,000 00	.....	1,250,000 00	An utter failure to provide for a very important branch of the public service. The United States have some $50,000,000 invested in navy-yards and appurtenances. For their general repairs and preservation about 2½ per cent. on their cost was appropriated last year; this year nothing. By permitting this vast property to go to ruin, a large item is added to the aggregate reduction of appropriations. Of course the sum required next year will be augmented by the amount withheld this year, together with a large sum in addition, on account of neglect to provide for them properly at this session.
109. Plans and specifications for public building at Auburn, N. Y.	4,000 00	.....	4,000 00	Neither a "reduction" nor a "saving." Having been paid for last year, the Congress was not called upon to pay again.
110. Expenses of officer to investigate and report upon existence and spread of cholera in Mexico.	5,000 00	.....	5,000 00	Do.
111. Officers and clerks in Treasury Department.	166,656 00	.....	166,656 00	This item is in no possible sense a saving, because the law authorizing the expenditure provides that it shall be re-imbursed to the Treasury by the national banks. (See section 3, sundry civil bill, approved March 3, 1875.)
112. Clerks and other officers in office of Comptroller of the Currency.	34,840 00	.....	34,840 00	The same remark applies to this as to the last item.
113. Experiments in testing iron and steel.	50,000 00	.....	50,000 00	Withheld from a valuable and important service, which was regarded by the President of the United States as of sufficient importance to warrant a special message recommending it.
114. To enable the Executive Departments of the Government to participate in the International Centennial Exhibition.	505,000 00	.....	505,000 00	In the published statement showing the reductions made by the House of Representatives, this item is charged to the appropriations of last Congress, while the sum of $1,500,000 appropriated for the same purpose by the present Congress is wholly omitted.
115. Geographic surveys west of 100th meridian.	60,000 00	.....	60,000 00	This was for surveys and explorations of the interior of the continent; and while it is a service of great value, it can doubtless be postponed a year or two without serious detriment to the country.
116. Bounties of sailors and marines	50,000 00	.....	50,000 00	Was rendered unnecessary this year by the reduction of force in the Navy. It had been paid hitherto to encourage enlistments.
Total	26,644,350 09	14,919,538 09	11,724,812 00
Reductions from 1876	.....	.....	11,724,812 00

POST-OFFICE BILL.

The post-office appropriation bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, for the year ending June 30, 1877, compared with the appropriations for the same purpose for the year ending June 30, 1876.

Service for which appropriated.	Appropriated for year ending June 30, 1876.	Appropriated by House bill for year ending June 30, 1877.	Reductions made in House bill.	Increase in House bill.	Remarks upon reductions made in House bill as shown in third column.
1. Pay of postmasters	$7,000,000	$6,800,000	$200,000	.....	This reduction is made upon recommendation of the Postmaster-General.
2. Clerks in post-offices	3,500,000	3,290,000	210,000	.....	An unwise reduction. The clerical force in the post-offices is not on the whole too large, nor are their salaries too high. It is, however, a "saving," by curtailment of service and of pay.
3. Letter-carriers and free-delivery	2,000,000	1,800,000	200,000	.....	A "saving" wrung from the hard-earned compensation of hard-worked and poorly-paid men.
4. Wrapping-paper	25,000	20,000	5,000	.....	Saved by the Department estimate, not by the House of Representatives.
5. Twine	55,000	45,000	10,000	.....	One-half of this reduction is attributable to Department estimates. The other half was conceded by the House in conference; hence there was no saving by House bill.
6. Post marking and canceling stamps	10,000	5,000	5,000	.....	No saving. The reduction was without good reason, and was conceded in conference by the House.
7. Letter-balances	3,000	3,000	.....	.....
8. Rent, light, and fuel for post-offices	500,000	390,000	110,000	.....	Fifty thousand of this reduction was a saving by Department estimates. The balance ($60,000) was merely an arbitrary reduction, more likely to result in a deficiency than a saving.
9. Stationery	50,000	45,000	5,000	.....	Not a saving, but an arbitrary reduction, conceded by the House in conference.
10. Furniture for post-offices	35,000	20,000	15,000	.....	Possibly a saving; probably only postponed to swell the appropriations at next session.
11. Miscellaneous items	150,000	50,000	100,000	.....	Merely an arbitrary reduction, one-half of which was conceded by the House in conference; the other half may prove a saving, but more likely a deficiency.
12. Inland-mail transportation	17,548,000	15,600,000	1,948,000	.....	Not a dollar of this large item is a "saving" in any sense; it is not even a reduction of expenditure. Through the rigid economy enforced by republican officials there remained at the end of last fiscal year an unexpended "balance" of $2,039,302, making the amount actually expended only $15,508,698, which is less than House bill by $91,302. Hence there is no actual saving, only an apparent reduction. The law fixes the compensation. This service is rapidly increasing, and every year demands increased appropriations. The result of the refusal of the House to make the necessary appropriations to meet this increased demand is seen already in the withdrawal of the "fast-mail trains," and will be further apparent before the close of the year, either in a curtailment of the service or in a deficiency bill, probably the latter. The appropriation in House bill would have nearly met the demands of last year, but do not meet the increase of service this year.
13. Pay of railway post-office clerks	1,257,141	1,125,000	132,141	.....	A saving in both these items, but one which is wrung from persons who do as much work for the compensation received as any in the Government service.
14. Pay of route-agents	1,050,000	945,000	105,000	.....
15. Pay of mail-route messengers	160,000	147,000	13,000	.....	Merely a curtailment of the service.
16. Pay of local agents	115,000	98,559	16,441	.....	A saving, the propriety of which depends upon whether these agents have been paid too much for the service rendered.
17. Pay of mail-messengers	700,000	621,000	79,000	.....	The same remark will apply to this as to the last item.
18. Mail locks and keys	21,400	20,000	1,400	.....	Reduced by Department estimates; not "saved" by House of Representatives.
19. Mail-bags and mail-bag catchers	210,000	175,000	35,000	.....	Ten thousand of this reduction is attributable to Department estimates; the balance ($25,000) is an arbitrary reduction below the wants of the service, and is probably merely a postponement.
20. Post-route maps	30,000	20,000	10,000	.....	Possibly a saving, but one which will produce considerable inconvenience.
21. Mail depredations and special agents	160,000	110,000	50,000	.....	An arbitrary and dangerous reduction. The amount appropriated last year was found indispensably necessary for the protection of the postal service from frauds and depredations. In view of the immeasurable interests confided to the mails, the statesmanship which in the name of "economy" strikes down the safeguards of the service is not to be commended.
22. Manufacture of postage-stamps	149,764	147,762	2,002	.....	Reduced by Department estimates; not "saved" by the House of Representatives.
23. Agents and assistants to distribute stamps.	6,900	6,900	.....	.....
24. Stamped envelopes and wrappers	446,520	535,878	.....	$89,358	An increase.
25. Distributing agents and assistants	16,300	10,000	6,300	.....	An arbitrary reduction, subsequently conceded by the House.
26. Manufacture of postal cards	159,806	216,760	.....	56,954	An increase.
27. Agents and assistants to distribute postal cards.	5,600	6,100	.....	500	Do.
28. Registered-package envelopes, seals, &c.	65,620	40,000	25,620	.....	Reduced by Department estimates; not "saved" by House of Representatives.
29. Official envelopes for postmasters	66,560	40,000	26,560	.....	Do.
30. Envelopes for dead letters	3,750 00	2,150 00	1,600 00	.....	Reduced by Department estimates; not "saved" by the House of Representatives.
31. Ship, steamboat, and way letters	7,500 00	7,500 00	.....	.....
32. Fees for attorneys, clerks, &c	7,500 00	.....	7,500 00	.....	Since passage of the House bill, this item has been conceded to be necessary, and is authorized to be taken from the appropriation to protect the mails from depredations, thus still further impairing the safeguards of the service.
33. Engraving, &c., drafts and warrants	3,000 00	1,500 00	1,500 00	.....	Reduced by Department estimates; not "saved" by House of Representatives.
34. Advertising	100,000 00	25,000 00	75,000 00	.....	Fifteen thousand of this reduction has since been conceded by the House, and the balance was rendered possible by an act of last Congress. No part is to be credited to the "economy" of this Congress.
35. Miscellaneous items	2,500 00	.....	2,500 00	.....	Fifteen hundred of this item has since been conceded as essential by the House. The "saving" is, therefore, only $1,000.
36. Foreign mail transportation	300,000 00	220,000 00	80,000 00	.....	This may prove a loss, but cannot possibly be a "saving" of one dollar. "Foreign mail transportation" has yielded a profit of over $100,000 a year for the last five years. The rates are fixed. The larger the business the greater the profit. Withholding whatever sum is necessary, is a loss to the Government.
37. Balance due foreign countries	80,000 00	50,000 00	30,000 00	.....	Reduced by Department estimates; not "saved" by House of Representatives.

The post-office appropriation bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, &c.—Continued.

Service for which appropriated.	Appropriated for year ending June 30, 1876.	Appropriated by House bill for year ending June 30, 1877.	Reductions made in House bill.	Increase in House bill.	Remarks upon reductions made in House bill as shown in third column.
38. Steamship service, China and Japan	$500,000 00	$250,000 00	$250,000 00	.....	Reduced by Department estimates; not "saved" by House of Representatives. The contract having expired since last year, no great credit for "economy" is due for not appropriating for it this year.
39. Steamship service, Brazil	37,500 00	.....	37,500 00	.....	Reduced by Department estimates; not "saved" by House of Representatives. This contract also has expired.
40. Official stamps for Post-Office Department.	986,000 00	850,000 00	136,000 00	.....	Reduced by Department estimates; not "saved" by House of Representatives.

INDIAN BILL.

The Indian appropriation bill as it passed the House of Representatives for the year ending June 30, 1877, compared with the act making appropriations for the same service for the year ending June 30, 1876.

[N. B.—The numbers marked thus * in the column of reductions show an increase and are to be deducted.]

Object of appropriation.	Appropriated for year ending June 30, 1876.	Appropriated by House bill for year ending June 30, 1877.	Reductions made in House bill.	Remarks upon reductions made by House bill as shown in third column.
Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches:
1. Installments under treaty	$30,000 00	$30,000 00	.....
2. Clothing	26,000 00	15,000 00	$11,000 00	Reduction was made by violating article 10 of the treaty of 1867 with said Indians.
3. Mechanics, physician, and teacher ..	7,700 00	7,700 00	.....
4. Transportation	4,000 00	.....	4,000 00	An amount for transportation in gross for the Indian service is appropriated for this year. Consequently this is not a "saving."
5. Blackfeet, Bloods, and Piegans.....	50,000 00	45,000 00	5,000 00	Reduced by disregarding article 8 of a treaty with said Indians made September 1, 1868. It is true the Senate has not ratified said treaty, but both parties have since acted upon it, and the Indians regard it as binding.
6. Assinaboines	30,000 00	.....	30,000 00	This sum has been provided for these Indians for several years. They are friendly and expect their friendship to be recognized. The House bill transfers them to the Fort Peck agency, but adds nothing to that appropriation on account of such transfer. Such "economy" promises large expenditures for Indian wars.
7. Cheyennes and Arapahoes	47,200 00	42,200 00	5,000 00	Transportation. All claims for transportation are appropriated in gross elsewhere in the bill this year.
8. Confederated tribes and bands of Indians in Middle Oregon.	7,600 00	8,100 00	*500 00	An increase.
9. Creeks	69,968 40	72,678 40	*2,710 00	Do.
10. Crows	167,623 00	132,623 00	35,000 00	Reduced by disregarding the treaty made with these Indians May 7, 1868. They are our friends and allies in the war against the Sioux, and deserve better treatment. This act of bad faith will probably make them our enemies.
11. Gros Ventres.....	35,000 00	.....	35,000 00	An omission to comply with the terms of an unratified treaty made with those Indians July 13, 1868. They are friendly, and regard this contract as a binding treaty. Withholding the amount which has been paid for several years may result in depredations costing many times the amount saved.
Kickapoos:
12. Interest.....	4,797 29	4,679 05	118 24	Reduced by Department estimates.
13. Settlement, support, &c.....	20,000 00	10,000 00	10,000 00	Probably a just and proper reduction. The Kickapoos having been settled in their new homes by last year's appropriations, so large a sum was not necessary this year. Reduction was made by Department estimates and not by House of Representatives.
14. Miamas of Kansas.....	11,500 00	11,540 00	*40 00
15. Klamaths and Modocs.....	17,100 00	15,100 00	2,000 00	Reduction made by Department estimates and not by House of Representatives.
16. Mixed Shoshones, Bannacks, and Sheep-Eaters.	20,000 00	15,000 00	5,000 00	A reduction rendered proper by change of treaty.
17. Omahas	25,100 00	20,900 00	4,200 00	Reduced by Department estimates; not by House of Representatives.
18. Osages.....	57,233 18	57,031 53	201 65
19. Pawnees.....	57,176 87	50,700 00	6,476 87	Reduced by omitting certain discretionary items, such as matron, teachers, &c.
20. Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi..	51,000 00	52,000 00	*1,000 00	An increase.
20½. River Crows.....	30,000 00	.....	30,000 00	Reduced by disregarding an agreement entered into with said Indians July 15, 1868. They regard the agreement as binding. They are our allies and friends; are now aiding us against the Sioux. Surely they deserve better treatment than to have their annuities denied while they are fighting our battles.
21. Shoshones, eastern bands.....	10,000 00	.....	10,000 00	An omission rendered proper by a change in treaty obligations.
Shoshones and Bannacks:
22. Shoshones.....	49,374 00	50,374 00	*1,000 00	An increase.
23. Bannacks	28,737 00	26,737 00	2,000 00	Reduced by omitting discretionary items.
24. Sioux of different tribes, including Santee Sioux of State of Nebraska.	1,572,600 00	1,325,600 00	247,000 00	Nearly all of this appropriation is discretionary. It has been made on the principle that it is "cheaper to feed than fight Indians." Unfortunately we are doing both. It is quite impossible to decide at present whether this is a judicious reduction or not. Its probable effect will be to largely increase the number of "hostiles."
25. Tabequache, Muache, Capote, Weeminuche, Yampa, Grand River, and Uinta bands of Utes.	73,020 00	68,020 00	5,000 00	Reduced by Department estimates; not by House of Representatives.
26. Winnebagoes	50,488 39	47,931 83	2,556 56	Do.
27. Apaches of Arizona and New Mexico.	450,000 00	400,000 00	50,000 00	Four hundred and fifty thousand dollars were appropriated last year, and subsequently there was a large deficiency appropriated. The reduction to $400,000 will make the deficiency next winter still larger.
28. Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Apaches, Kiowas, Comanches, and Wichitas.	300,000 00	250,000 00	50,000 00	Possibly a saving; probably a deficiency.
29. Civilization and subsistence of Indians of the Malheur reservation.	35,000 00	25,000 00	10,000 00	A discretionary item. It is saved by denying to the Indians the sum they expect and have hithero received.

INCIDENTAL EXPENSES OF THE INDIAN SERVICE.
36. In Arizona	65,000 00	20,000 00	45,000 00	These thirteen items, amounting to $242,500, may be considered together. The appropriations under these heads constitute all the provision made by the Government for thirteen agencies distributed through three States and nine Territories, embracing over 100,000 Indians, 22,000 of whom have been to some extent brought under the influence of civilization. The sum appropriated by House bill is totally inadequate. A reduction anywhere else would have been attended by less disastrous consequences. Withholding these comparatively small sums will exasperate the Indians all over these States and Territories, and may induce them to join the hostile savages in a general Indian war.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I am aware of the difficulty of making an impromptu reply to a well-prepared written speech, delivered by one so intelligent on all subjects as the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] But I shall make no apology. The bill now under consideration has been made an occasion for the discussion of political topics, and if I trespass upon the attention of the Senate a few moments in the same line of remarks it will be justified by the example of the Senator who has just taken his seat.

The effort of the Senator from Minnesota has been, if possible, to deprive the democratic party of all the advantage which he supposes it possesses in the coming campaign arising out of the reduction of public expenditures. He is a member of the Appropriation Committee, and knows full well that the reduction of expenditure proposed on the part of the democratic House of Representatives reached some $38,000,000 as the bills came from the House. He knows that by the persistence of the House of Representatives against the adverse wishes of the Senator, against the strenuous efforts of the Senator and his political friends to prevent any reduction, there has been an actual curtailment of more than $29,000,000, extorted by the persistent determination in favor of economy by the House of Representatives from an unwilling majority in this Senate.

The Senator desires in the closing hours of the session to put upon the record a protest against that economy and to strip it of the merit which it possesses; but the people of this country, when they see that the expenses of this Government are reduced, when they learn that the House of Representatives only succeeded in reducing expenditures by the most persistent determination in favor of economy, will not fail to appreciate and give credit to that party which has originated and effected an economy and a reduction of expenditures which if it had been practiced for the last ten years would have relieved the depressed industries of the country and rendered it prosperous at the present time. It is admitted by the Senator from Minnesota that the House bills did propose a reduction of over $38,000,000, but he attempts to parry the force of that by endeavor ing to show that these reductions of expenses are in fact no reductions, that many of them will be supplied by deficiencies. I inquire how the Senator from Minnesota knows that at the next session of Congress there will be any bills passed for deficiencies. I say to the Senator that he and his friends had better put themselves in harmony with the sentiment expressed by the democratic candidate for the Presidency in 1865, "Live within your income." I say to the Senator that he and his party who are now controlling the Executive Departments of this Government had better live within their appropriations. There will not be a willing Congress here at the next session to indulge and to look over and to excuse and to palliate extravagance in any Department. Do not calculate on large deficiency bills being passed. Live within your income, live within your appropriations; and I caution the Senator to advise his friends in advance that there must be no needless expenditure of the public money, expecting that it will be condoned by the democratic House of Representatives at the next session of Congress.

Mr. President, the Senator says that the boasted promise of a reduction of $40,000,000 has dwindled down to $29,000,000. Let me ask the Senate whose fault that is. Have not the House shown an anxiety to reduce to the full extent that they claimed they were able to reduce? Have they not continuously insisted that the Senate on the disagreement of the two Houses should yield and that the reduction, which they proposed should be allowed? It ill becomes the Senator from Minnesota, who steadily resisted the demands of the House for economy, now to complain of the House because they have not fully redeemed their pledge of a year ago. They have done all in their power to redeem it; but they have been met and contested in every point; not a single appropriation bill has come from the House to the Senate but has encountered the fiercest opposition of the Senator and his friends. If the wishes of the House had been complied with, every dollar which they proposed to curtail the public expenditures would have been saved, and it is a disingenuous argument now to say that the House has failed to redeem its promise to cut down the expense some $40,000,000 when that Senator and every Senator on this floor knows that such was the wish and such was the effort of the democratic House of Representatives.

I do not propose to follow the Senator from Minnesota in the various items of appropriations to which he has referred. That would be utterly impossible in an impromptu speech following immediately the well prepared written speech of the Senator. I shall speak of results therefore, and not of items of appropriation. But one of the items for which he complains there was no appropriation made was for the purpose of employing clerks to superintend the rebel archives, as they are called. I wish in reference to that to say that those archives have been in the possession of the Government several years. I do not know the exact period. There have been appropriations every session for the purpose of arranging those archives, and I am told that they are all arranged and labeled and that every one of those papers can be obtained without difficulty and that the employment of those clerks was simply in aid of attorneys and others who desired to use those papers, and that the services of clerks, for whom the Senate proposed to appropriate $6,000, were not needed for the public business of the country, but solely to aid men who had business professionally with those papers. Certainly there has been sufficient length of time to have had every paper arranged alphabetically and labeled, and I am sure that that is the case. Why then does the Senator from Minnesota complain that an appropriation of $6,000 to pay clerks for that service was struck out by the House of Representatives? Was it not proper that it should be done? The House of Representatives and its committees were vigilant and ascertained the fact that there was no necessity for such an appropriation, which would have been simply continuing in place persons who had been put there by political influence, persons whose services were not necessary for the interests of the country, I again repeat. That is one of the items of economy of which the Senator from Minnesota complains. The House deserves credit for the curtailment of all such expenditures of public money.

Mr. SARGENT. I am sorry to prolong a political discussion; but I would like to call the Senator's attention to one fact, of which, perhaps, he is not aware, that shows the necessity of the appropriation. I presume if the House had known the fact they would not have resisted it.

A few days ago I reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs a bill for the relief of David De Haven. The evidence seemed to be that his vessel had been recaptured by the United States and that the vessel never, with his consent at any rate, was in the rebel service and probably not in it at all. These seemed to be the facts, and desiring to do him justice I so reported and also reported my views of the law. The views of the committee on the law being somewhat questioned, the result was a delay and the bill was not immediately acted upon. The discussion, however, called the attention of the Adjutant-General to the matter. He had clerks to do the duty then, which denial of appropriation now deprives him of. I received a communication from him of a startling character, drawn from these records, which I may state in a few words——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not care to have the Senator interrupt me in this way.

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me to state the circumstance.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Minnesota declined to yield to interruptions in advance. I desire always to be courteous; but I I do not care to have injected in any speech of mine——

Mr. SARGENT. I did not suppose the Senator was making a campaign speech or I would not have interposed. If the Senator will not yield, I will take my seat.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was willing to hear a brief statement.

Mr. SARGENT. I have only a few more words to say.

Mr. KERNAN. The speech on the other side was a great campaign speech and stopped all our work.

Mr. SARGENT. Perhaps. But I was sorry it was made, because it was interrupting business that I wanted to press; but I think that the fact I wish to state is interesting.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator can follow me.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not want to follow you; but if the Senator does not want to hear me, I will surrender.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I prefer to go on.

Mr. KERNAN. I want to go on with the bill we are trying to pass.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It may be that it will be a little more convenient for the Departments to have regular clerks in charge of these papers; but clerks from their own Departments can have no difficulty in readily procuring any of the papers which are already labeled. If the Adjutant-General desires to have any of these papers, can he not detail any clerk of his own to go there and get any paper he desires, when every one, I am informed by the Senator from Connecticut, is labeled and can easily be found?

So much for that. I will not follow the Senator through all the appropriations; but I say generally that, in my opinion, the reduction of expenditures is not only wise and proper, but that it has been demanded by the public judgment of the country. The people have been subjected to enormous taxation; they have paid a very large amount of taxes into the public Treasury. They have been doing it ever since the republican party came into power; and notwithstanding we have had peace for eleven years, taxation is still high and oppressive. Of course there have been some reductions since the termination of the war, but the people now are less able to pay than formerly. The continual drain which has been made on the resources of the people has rendered them less able to meet the demands of the Government on them, and they have decreed that there shall be retrenchment and reform. They elected the majority of the present House of Representatives under the belief and with the expectation and desire that they would effectuate some reform in reference to the expenditures of the General Government. The democrats of the House met that demand. They have cut down, according to the Senator from Minnesota, the expenses over $29,000,000, and but for the resistance and opposition which they met in this Chamber they would have had that reduction some $10,000,000 more.

Now, I say to my friend the Senator from Minnesota, that if the democratic party in the coming canvass succeed to power, if they succeed in elevating to the Presidency Mr. Tilden, of New York, it will be a guarantee to the country that the expenses of the Government will be further reduced. I have believed for years that we were paying from sixty to one hundred million dollars in taxes more than we ought to pay, and I have no question that the elevation of Mr. Tilden to the Presidency will insure a further reduction equal at least to that which has been made at the present session.

I shall pass on and notice some other matters that were referred to by the Senator from Minnesota. He says that the democratic party has charged that there has been extravagance. I think the action of the House of Representatives in curtailing the expenses of the Government in a single session $29,000,000 demonstrates the truth of that charge conclusively. I need not go into the particulars to establish that charge. I can furnish individual instances in which there has been extravagant use of the public money; but the general fact that a reduction has taken place of more than $29,000,000 at the present session fully establishes the correctness of the charge of extravagance which we have for years preferred against the republican party.

The Senator from Minnesota says that the charge of extravagance has not been established and the charges of corruption have failed of proof. It is always unpleasant to prefer charges of corruption against men or against parties; but I may be allowed to say that there is a general impression in the country, and the facts elicited at the present session of Congress in my opinion justify the correctness of that conclusion, that there have been malversations in office amounting to corruption in every proper sense of the word. Sir, "corruption" is not limited to the mere fact of taking bribes. The use of the public money without authority of law and in violation of law, the use of the public money for the purpose of promoting individual interests or for partisan political purposes, is in every proper sense corruption in office.

Well, sir, the investigations this session have shown that there has been defiance of law, use of money without authority of law and in contravention of law. A notable instance of that might be pointed out in the issuing of bonds in this District by the board of commissioners without authority of law. The records of this country abound with such instances. I do not say that they occur in every Department of the Government; but I say they have occurred in some of the Departments of the Government and have been brought to light by the investigations that have taken place. Why were not these investigations instituted by our republican friends? They have been in power for fifteen years. They have had the control of the Senate and the control of the House of Representatives; and when complaints have been made and investigations have been ordered, how have they resulted? Most usually in what has been termed the whitewashing of the party accused. They have revealed none of the corruptions, none of the extravagances which have been brought to light at the first session of a democratic House of Representatives. And now, I ask, has there not been misuse of the public money? I cannot refer to all the Departments of this Government in which there have been waste and extravagance; but let me call your attention to one Department only where the investigations of the House of Representatives show conclusively that there have been very great disregard of law and very great waste and extravagance in the use of the public money. Let me invite your attention to the Navy Department.

I do not wish in any remarks which I make to say anything unkind of the Secretary of the Navy. So far as I know that officer, he is a gentleman of character and integrity. I would be the last man to cast any imputation upon the Secretary. Unless I knew the fact that he himself was guilty of some willful malversation in office, I would prefer no such charge against him. I believe, however, that he has been careless in his administration of the Department committed to his charge; and, by reason of that carelessness, by reason of that inattention to the duties devolving upon him, especially in the supervision of subordinates, that there has been much waste of the public money. What have we appropriated to the Navy Department? I need not go back to the beginning of the republican administration of the Government in 1861. I will take it only during the existence of the present Administration, for eight years. Our appropriations have averaged more than $20,000,000 a year for that time. I think they have reached somewhere near $175,000,000 or $180,000,000 during that period.

Now, what is the condition of your Navy? With this lavish expenditure of money we ought to have had a navy able to compete with the proudest naval establishment in the world. But what is the condition of the Navy to-day? It is declared to be in a very inferior condition, unable to compete with the navies of several of the European powers. Notwithstanding we have expended nearly $180,000,000 since President Grant came into power, still we have an inefficient Navy, one unable to protect our commerce in case of war, or to render very valuable service in case of collision with any foreign power. I have looked somewhat into the report of the House Naval Committee, and I desire to call attention now to the statement of Admiral Porter. He states the amount appropriated:

> The amount calculated for these gradual additions to the Navy may appear large in the aggregate, but it is in fact small when compared with the appropriations estimated for from 1866 to 1876, ($251,779,000,) which, after deducting pay of officers and men and expenses of the Marine Corps, amount, for navy-yards, repairs, equipment, and building a few small vessels, to an average of $18,200,000 annually. This, too, after an expenditure of $280,000,000 during the war, which ought to have left us a powerful Navy. With all this expenditure, we are not at present provided with a single first-class vessel, either for defense or for fast steaming, nor have we one powerful rifle-gun in the Navy.

This is the declaration of Admiral Porter in reference to the condition of the Navy. He goes on:

> Our Navy, taken as a whole, is worth nothing, and the sooner the country understands that fact the better. It would require a great stretch of credulity to make one believe that the Navy is in the flourishing condition represented by Chief Constructor Hanscom in his late report to the honorable Secretary of the Navy. Probably he believes what he says, that "the power of our iron-clads for harbor and coast defense, where the fighting will be done in smooth water, must be considered equal, if not superior, to that of a large number of sea-going iron-clads of foreign nations;" and that "no officer in command of one of our monitors would hesitate to engage in action, in smooth water, any sea-going iron-clad vessel yet afloat, except perhaps a few of the latest type."
> There is not a navy in the world that is not in advance of us as regards ships and guns, and I, in common with the older officers of the service, feel an anxiety on the subject which can only be appreciated by those who have to command fleets and take them into battle. If called upon at this time to command the naval forces of the United States in case of hostilities, a position which it is my ambition and my right to fill, I should be put to my wits' end to succeed with such an incongruous set of vessels as we now possess.

That is the condition of your Navy after the expenditure of from $180,000,000 to $200,000,000 since the present Administration came into power. Now has there been no waste of that money? Where has it gone? What has become of it? This report reveals to the American people some of the leaks, some of the waste, some of the extravagance that has been practiced in that Department. Why, sir, men have sat at the door—I speak of course figuratively—of the Navy Department, men of influence with this Administration, and extorted from persons who desired contracts large sums of money for their influence. I cannot name all the cases of that kind that have occurred; but there is one firm that acknowledges according to this report to have received $300,000 for the influence which it possessed with the Navy Department. I do not say that the Secretary of the Navy knew that those men were speculating upon their friendship with him. Far from it. I am willing to believe that if the Secretary of the Navy had known that parties were selling their influence with the Department and extorting large sums of money from persons having business with the Department he would have dismissed such men from his confidence. But the fact exists that those men had influence and that they sold it, and thereby obtained contracts for their clients at extravagant prices.

This investigation reveals the fact that Orville Grant, a brother of the President of the United States, possessing influence with this Administration, sold that influence and made considerable amounts of money thereby for himself and obtained fat jobs for his employers. I cannot detail all the operations of this character. Now, whatever was paid to these men for their influence entered into the cost of the material which was furnished to the Navy. This Mr. Grant, paid for his influence, secured a contract for vessel-knees for a firm in Baltimore, and purchased them in my State, when citizens of my own State desired to obtain contracts to deliver vessel-knees for the Navy but could not obtain such contracts. He paid, I am informed, from $7 to $9 per knee, and they were delivered in New York and Brooklyn, and paid for by the Government at the rate of $27 and $28 per knee. These materials were not needed by the Department, and no one but Grant could obtain such a contract.

But, Mr. President, part of the money appropriated to the Navy has gone for political purposes. It is well known that on the eve of every election a large number of persons not necessary for the service have been employed in the navy-yards of the country, put there for political purposes alone, given employment, that their votes might be controlled, and the committee that investigated naval affairs declare that in their judgment there has been $1,000,000 each election year wasted in the Navy Department for political purposes alone, not for advancing the public service, but for the purpose of assisting the republican party. I will read some of the testimony on this point. The following is an extract from the examination of Constructor Webb, of the Kittery navy-yard, to be found on pages 53 and 54 of the testimony taken in reference the Kittery navy-yard by the House Naval Committee:

> Question. In the selection of that labor at any one of the yards at which you have been located, is it within your knowledge that a contest of either political party has in any way interfered so as to determine anything about their selection?
> Answer. Not with me.
>
> Q. Do you know whether the fact exists?
>
> A. I know the fact exists by information derived from the commandant of the station.
> Q. Did you ever know of a meeting to occur in the office of the commandant of the navy-yard at Kittery in which politicians of either New Hampshire or Maine were present?
>
> A. I was so informed by Commodore Pennock that such was the case.
>
> Q. Did you see a list that was furnished at that meeting?
>
> A. I was furnished with a list by the commodore of the station, which was addressed to him by a committee.
> Q. That was a list of men to be taken on for work?
>
> A. A list of men to be employed.
> Q. Didn't it come to you in the first instance, and you refused to recognize any outside authority?
>
> A. It did.
> Q. Didn't you demand that it should have the sanction of some other authority?
>
> A. I sent it back to where it came from, with word that it must be addressed to the commanding officer of the yard, as I received no such communications.
> Q. And subsequently it came to you through the commandant, did it?
>
> A. The same list addressed to the commandant came to me.
>
> Q. In that case did you exercise any discretion at all or just take them on in obedience to the order?
>
> A. I considered that I was not allowed any discretion in the matter, but simply to take the men and operate them to the best advantage for the interests of the Government.

On the same point Commodore Fairfax, whose testimony will be found on page 96, gave the following testimony speaking of the abuses at the yard:

> Question. What are those abuses?
>
> Answer. The unnecessary number of men employed prior to elections.
>
> Q. Is that a matter within your own personal observation?
> A. Yes, sir; at the Kittery navy-yard. I was there two years, and have witnessed the constant interference on the part of Mr. Hanscom in discharging and employing men. He often took on worthless men instead of good men. I have an impression that Mr. Robeson, being a very indolent man and not attending to his duties, has allowed abuses through these Bureaus. There are good, honest men in the navy-yards that cannot give information in consequence of their not being acquainted with the books; instances of material having been received when it ought to have been rejected.

To show the extent to which this abuse was carried and that the public money was used for political purposes, I will cite the letter of the Chief of the Bureau of Construction, addressed to Commodore Nichols, United States Navy, commandant at the Boston navy-yard. The election was coming off, and the election of the republican candidates for Congress was desired by the Administration, and Hanscom wrote as follows:

> Private.] BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS., October 23, 1874.
> MY DEAR COMMODORE: I wish you would approve requisitions for men to be employed as they may be made until the 1st of November.
>
> Some fifty additional men has allowed from the Chelsea district, and I suppose some more will be required from Gooch's district.
>
> The administration desire the success of Gooch and Frost.
>
> Yours respectfully,
>
> I. HANSCOM.
> Commodore E. T. NICHOLS, U. S. N.,
> Commandant.

It seems Constructor Hanscom had nothing to do but demand that men should be taken on just prior to an election, paid for a month or two, usually for the months of October and November, and discharged about the 1st of December; and it is shown by the tables that one thousand and fifty-nine men at the Boston navy-yard alone, just before the election, were employed in the navy-yard in order that their votes might be controlled.

The committee of the House of Representatives comes to the conclusion that in this item alone, the employment of unnecessary labor for political purposes, a million dollars has been annually spent for several years past. That is what has become of your money. Certainly there has been no proper application of the $180,000,000 or $200,000,000 that has been appropriated during the present Administration to sustain the Navy; but it has been wasted in fat jobs and contracts and in expenditures for political purposes. When the people of the country are paying taxes to carry on the Government, have they no right to complain of such diversion of the public money improperly used for the purpose of perpetuating the republican party in power? That a portion of the money which they have paid in should be used for such purposes is a just matter of complaint on the part of men of all political parties.

I have not time to go through with this entire report, or I could show that there have been not only repeated violations of law, arising more perhaps from negligence than from design, but that there has been a careless administration of the Department, which has resulted in immense loss to the Government.

The Senator from Minnesota says that there has been a diligent search for corruption and extravagance and that none have been found. I have pointed him to these instances, and if he would search these reports carefully and impartially he would find in every report upon affairs in the Department submitted to the House of Representatives that a careless administration of the Departments, an unnecessary expenditure of money of the Government, of which the people justly have a right to complain, has been revealed.

I do not like to speak of corruption. The Senator says there has been none found. Sir, have we not had a case pending here for months in this Senate? Do not the records of this body show the evidence that a high public officer, controlling immense patronage, occupying one of the highest positions in the American Government, has been brought to your bar and been put upon trial upon charges of that character? I would not pursue a falling man, and I only refer to this in reply to the declaration of the Senator from Minnesota that there has been no corruption. I will not say that the President of the United States has been compelled to dismiss a Private Secretary because of charges of this kind; I will not say that there has been to a certain extent a re-organization of the clerical force of the White House because of charges of this nature; but I will say that there have been prosecutions of public offenders who have defrauded the revenues of the country; that a large number of men have been convicted for frauds on the public Treasury, and that much of the revenue of the country has by reason of frauds and corruption been diverted from the vaults of the Treasury. If you go to Milwaukee, if you go to Indianapolis, if you go to Saint Louis, you will find that there has been the greatest possible fraud practiced upon the revenue of the country, and that for a long time there was not the vigilance in guarding the revenues which proper administration ought to have insured.

Then, Mr. President, it is a very significant fact that when a prosecution was commenced against these men some of the very men most efficient in ferreting out these frauds upon the revenue and bringing to condign punishment the men who had practiced the frauds have been dismissed from the public service; I will not say because of their vigilance in these matters. The public will make up their own opinions in reference to that.

Mr. President, as I have no set speech I shall not be particular in reference to the topics which I introduce consecutively in my remarks; and I shall at this point now call attention to a statement made by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] not now in his seat, in regard to the figures submitted by Mr. Tilden in his letter of acceptance. I do it for the purpose of correcting an error made by the Senator from Ohio. While he was criticising and analyzing as best he could the inimitable letter of the democratic candidate for President, he took occasion to represent that Governor Tilden had fallen into a gross error in reference to the amount of Federal taxes paid by the people in the last eleven years. The Senator stated that Governor Tilden had made a mistake of nearly $500,000,000, and he went into calculations and submitted tables to establish that fact. If such a statement had been made by any ordinary Senator perhaps it might be unnecessary to give it notice, but the statement was made by the chairman of the Finance Committee, occupying himself a high position in relation to the question of the finances of the country. Therefore any error which he may impute to Governor Tilden unless contradicted may carry with it weight to the country. It is only because of that fact that I now deem it necessary to notice the remarks of the Senator from Ohio. My friend, the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] the other day submitted estimates and statements to show that there was no error on the part of Governor Tilden, and proved very conclusively from the expenditures of the General Government that the conclusions of Governor Tilden were right, and that the conclusions of the Senator from Ohio were erroneous. I shall take it upon another basis. The Senator from Ohio said:

> In another clause, which I will not trouble you to read in full, Governor Tilden says that—
> "The Federal taxes of the last eleven years reach the gigantic sum of $4,500,000,000."
> I showed you last night, in reply to another statement, that that was totally erroneous. He has fallen down $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 below the democratic platform; but the whole amount, as I showed you, that was collected from all sources, was $4,192,633,000, and one hundred and sixty-odd millions of this was for the premium on gold sold, which was a source of revenue used to pay off the premium on bonds purchased. Deducting one sum from the other leaves about $4,000,000,000; and now Governor Tilden, on a simple fact that might be solved by reference to a public document, states the amount that was raised at $4,500,000,000, or a mistake of $500,000,000.

That is the statement of the Senator from Ohio. He ought to have been, in my judgment, a little more careful in his declaration that there was an error in the statement of Governor Tilden, because he has himself fallen into a very egregious blunder in representing that there was an error of $500,000,000 on the part of Governor Tilden. He admits that there was collected from all sources $4,192,633,000, and that one hundred and sixty-odd millions of this was for the premium on gold sold and $4,000,000,000 from taxes; and he supplements a table at the end of his speech showing the amount derived from customs, which are payable in gold, during the eleven years. He gives the total amount derived from customs at $1,973,589,621.26, and he shows that there was $167,037,384.39 premium upon the gold sold.

The statement of Governor Tilden was made upon a currency basis, and when he stated that there had been $4,500,000,000 paid in taxes he meant of course in currency, and did not mean in gold. The Senator from Ohio, from the manner in which he placed his statement, evidently designed to keep out of view that this premium on gold sold was derived from taxation; that it was gold paid by taxation which was sold and realized the premium of $167,037,384.39. That is as much a part of the taxes as anything else, and when added to the $4,000,000,000, which the Senator admits, would make the sum $4,167,037,384.39. That was the premium on the gold actually sold, not upon the amount collected. You collected $1,973,589,621.26 in gold, and sold less, I suppose, than eight hundred millions of that amount and realized upon it over $167,000,000. If you calculate the premium on the residue of the gold that was paid for customs at the same rates annually that was paid for the gold sold, you will find that the premium which would have been realized, added to the $4,167,037,384.39 admitted to have been received from taxes, will reach the sum mentioned by Governor Tilden. So that the Senator from Ohio, himself occupying a very high position, rose in his place here and charged the democratic candidate for President with a gross error amounting to $500,000,000, and from the simplest calculation you find the mistake is attributed to himself and not to Governor Tilden. In 1866, one of the years which the Senator places in his statement, you only realized from customs $179,046,651.58, and yet the premium on the sales of gold that year were $38,083,055.68.

If the Senator from Ohio had gone into a careful calculation and ascertained the amount of taxes actually paid and added the premium on gold received from customs, he would have found that there was no error in the statement of Governor Tilden, and would not have been at fault in his calculations.

I deemed it proper to make this statement, because I knew the importance that would be attached to a statement made by the chairman of the Finance Committee. Knowing that that statement was erroneous, not by design I admit, but because the Senator himself had not gone into a proper investigation of this subject, I felt that it was due to the democratic candidate for President that in this Senate Chamber, on the very theater where he had been charged with an error amounting to five hundred millions, the correction should be made. The statement of the Senator from Ohio has been corrected upon a different basis by the Senator from Connecticut in his speech the other day, but I have chosen to make the correction upon the basis which I have brought before the Senate in order to show that either by an examination of the expenditures or by an examination of the money actually paid into the Treasury from taxation there was no error in the statement of Governor Tilden, but that the Senator from Ohio was himself mistaken.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator from Delaware to yield to allow me to move that the Senate take a recess at five o'clock until half past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Very well.

RECESS.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that at five o'clock the Senate take a recess until half past seven this evening.

Mr. ANTHONY. There ought to be an executive session some time this evening. I am afraid we shall not get a quorum here to-night.

Mr. EATON. We can have an executive session at half past seven, when we first meet.

Mr. ANTHONY. The difficulty is there will be nobody here.

Mr. SARGENT. Then there will not be anybody to prevent action.

Mr. ANTHONY. I shall not interfere with the Senator who has charge of the pending bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the Senate take a recess at five o'clock until half past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House passed a concurent resolution for the printing of one thousand extra copies of the report of the Superintendent of Coast Survey for the year ending June 30, 1874, and for the printing of the same number of copies of his report for the year ending June 30, 1875, for distribution by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me, as it is nearly five o'clock, to ask unanimous consent to present a report from a committee of conference? It will probably take but a moment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. SARGENT. With the consent of the Senator from Delaware, I ask unanimous consent, without displacing the business before the Senate, to present a conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 16, 51, 77, 82, 87, 91, 94, 98, 105, 107, and 108.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 60, 61, 62, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 78, 79, 81, 83, 84, 85, 86, 88, 90, 92, 93, 95, 96, 97, 100, 101, 103, 104, 111, 113, 115, 116, 117, 119, and 121.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 14, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out of said amendment "Portugal, Switzerland, Greece, Denmark, Ecuador, Colombia, and Bolivia," and strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty-two," and strike out "five thousand" and insert "five hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 18, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Add as a new paragraph:

"For salaries of chargés d'affaires to Denmark, Greece, Switzerland, Portugal, and Paraguay and Uruguay, at $5,000 each, $25,000."

And the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 24, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 41, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out of said amendment "Swatow;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 58 and 59, and agree to the paragraph where the amendments occur, with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of said paragraph insert the following:

"Cork, Dublin, Prescott, Port Sarnia, St. John's, (Canada East,) Barbadoes, Fort Erie, Leeds, Dundee, Leith, Toronto, Hamilton, Halifax, St. John's, (New Brunswick,) Kingston, (Jamaica,) Coaticook, Nassau, (New Providence,) Cardiff, Port Louis, (Mauritius,) Bermuda, Quebec."

And the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 63, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "Vladivostock;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 74, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "Goderich, Windsor, (Canada,) Malta," and restore "Windsor," (Nova Scotia;) and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 75, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "Nantes and La Rochelle;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 76, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "Port Mahon, Valencia;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 80, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "Santa Cruz;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 89, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "Maranham;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 99, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out of said amendment "fifty-one thousand" and insert "forty-two thousand six hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 102, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "six" and insert "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 106, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "and thirty-one thousand eight" and insert "and fifteen thousand," and strike out "one hundred and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 109, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "seven hundred" and insert "one thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 110, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "nine" and insert "two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 112, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "four" and insert "two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 114, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "ten" and insert "nine," and in line 2, page 9, of the bill, strike out "thousand" and insert "five hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 118, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "two thousand six" and insert "three thousand one;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 120, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 122, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph:

"For compensation of such diplomatic and consular officers heretofore compensated by salaries for whose salaries no appropriation is made by this act such amount as shall be necessary to pay their salaries as fixed by law until they shall have notice to close their offices, which notice shall be at once sent to them by the Secretary of State, and for the time allowed by law for transit from their respective posts to their places of residence, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

And the Senate agree to the same.

A. A. SARGENT,
GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
T. M. NORWOOD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

O. R. SINGLETON,
WM. S. HOLMAN,
CHAS. FOSTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest to the Senator from California that he explain the report.

Mr. SARGENT. The proposition was made to the Senate conferees by the House conferees to exactly divide the money difference between the two Houses upon the diplomatic portion of the bill, and also upon the consular portion of the bill. The Senate conferees took some time to consult over that proposition and consider it, to ascertain how the bill could be arranged, in order to see if it could be arranged without absolute injury to the public service. As a result of the conference, on getting the best light they could, they assented to the proposition, and that is the financial aspect of the bill. One-half the difference between the two Houses on the diplomatic portion of the bill was $82,750. Under the best advice we could get we have proportioned that reduction and provided for it by making no appropriation for the missions to Portugal, Switzerland, Bolivia, Ecuador, Colombia, Paraguay and Uruguay, which are one, Greece, and Denmark, and by cutting down the contingent expenses $25,000, and a certain item in the bill relating to chargés d'affaires $20,250. This makes a total reduction of $107,750; but we have added chargés d'affaires in Portugal, Switzerland, Greece, Denmark, and Paraguay and Uruguay, being five of the most important missions which are not provided for, at an expense of $25,000, which, deducted from $107,750, makes the exact one-half of the difference between the two Houses on that portion of the bill, $82,750.

On the consular part of the bill, one-half of the difference between the two Houses was $125,318. We have left unappropriated for by this bill the following consulates: Swatow, Southamptom, Vladivostock, Malta, Oporto, Santa Cruz, Port Said, Nantes, La Rochelle, Port Mahon, Valencia, Stettin, Maranham, Cyprus, Bucharest, Venice, Milan, Galoon, Turk's Island, Hakodadi, Goderich and Windsor, Canada West. This makes twenty-two consulates which are unprovided for and left out of the bill, no appropriation being made for them whatever. The House made a reduction of between thirty and forty. We have taken eighteen of those that they left out, and instead of the others we have taken four which we considered could be better dispensed with or turned into feed consulates than the ones they designated. In addition to this, we cut down for consular clerks, $8,000; for interpreters, $1,500; for loss by exchange, $38,000; contingent expenses, $16,850; two items relating to the Spanish commission, in the aggregate, $1,000; rents of prisons, $2,000; for keepers of prisons, $500; and for the relief of American seamen, $25,000, leaving that item in the bill $75,000. The expenses for this purpose this year were $63,000, and three years ago $131,000. The average is about $100,000 a year. During this fiscal year, if there is no storm or disaster of a far-reaching character, as there was three years ago, the Department may get through with $75,000, and perhaps a little less. We added, under the necessity of the bill, about $800 for minor items, which I will not explain; and this makes the amount a little more than one-half the difference between the two Houses.

By this arrangement we have conceded no principle insisted upon by the Senate. The offices retained are retained at the salaries heretofore allowed by law. Where there is no consolidation of offices we have not legislated in any degree in this bill. We have simply left certain parts of the service unprovided for which we thought could be so left with the least injury to the service.

If any Senator has any question to ask with reference to the report I shall be happy to give information, but I do not wish to take up further time.

Mr. McMILLAN. May I ask the Senator what was done with the mission to Sweden and Denmark?

Mr. SARGENT. Denmark has a chargé d'affaires. Sweden and Norway remain as they were.

Mr. INGALLS. Has any change been made in the mission at Santiago de Chili, South America?

Mr. SARGENT. No; Chili and Peru remain as they were.

Mr. INGALLS. Do the salaries remain unchanged?

Mr. SARGENT. They are just the same. I ask for the vote on the adoption of the report.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the Senator from California a question. I should like to know how much is the amount of saving by abolishing the services of ministers to Colombia, Ecuador, Paraguay, and Uruguay, and substituting chargés.

Mr. SARGENT. At Paraguay and Uruguay there is a saving of $10,000, and the salaries at the other three countries mentioned by the Senator are $7,500 each. That in the aggregate is $32,500. For Paraguay and Uruguay there is a chargé d'affaires, $5,000; and I believe that is the only one which the Senator mentions where there is a chargé d'affaires.

Mr. MORRILL. Is there any sum appropriated for the return of these ministers?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. How much?

Mr. SARGENT. I should have mentioned that. There is $25,000 appropriated for that purpose, an addition which the House concedes.

Mr. MORRILL. Then in footing it up how is it? Have we a loss or profit in the transaction?

Mr. SARGENT. You mean is there a saving?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes.

Mr. SARGENT. We have a saving, if that can be called a saving which omits to appropriate for a service established by law. We have a saving in that there is not so much money taken out of the Treasury. If you ask me whether I think it is judicious, I say no.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If you do not eat your breakfast you save it.

Mr. SARGENT. Exactly; as the Senator suggests, if you do not eat your breakfast you save it.

Mr. MORRILL. When you deduct the cost of chargés d'affaires for these places and the amount of $25,000 appropriated to get the ministers home from what would have been their salaries, I do not understand that there is any saving at all.

Mr. HOWE. Is the consular force increased in those countries from which the ministers are withdrawn?

Mr. SARGENT. A chargé d'affaires is put in each of the five following places: Portugal, Switzerland, Greece, Denmark, and Paraguay and Uruguay, they being one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Those are $5,000.

Mr. WEST. What are the other missions abolished for which there are no chargés d'affaires?

Mr. SARGENT. Bolivia, Ecuador, and Colombia. I think it must be admitted that the Senate conferees have done pretty well under very hard circumstances.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senator from California if any estimate has been made of the loss which our revenue will suffer by the discontinuance of these consulates?

Mr. SARGENT. I see the force of the question, but necessarily the amount is only speculative. It is a consideration which I have urged on the floor, and for weeks I have urged it before the committee of conference.

Mr. ANTHONY. I venture the prediction, and I do not think my friend from California will differ with me, that for every dollar that we have saved in abolishing the consulates at commercial ports the revenue will suffer $10 every year.

Mr. SARGENT. I quite agree with the Senator. I should like this thing, however, to be understood, and it is probably understood by the Senate, that with reference to quite a number of consulates which are abolished the result will be to take more money out of the Treasury than the amount of salary saved, because there is power to put a feed consul in every one of those places. If the fees be $1,700 and the consul receives a salary of $1,500, under the new arrangement he would get the $1,700 fees. That was the uniform policy for a number of years, but it was changed to a salary in most cases. Instead of allowing the consuls to have the fees as before that time, they were paid a salary. It was said that years ago the consul at Liverpool got $50,000 a year in fees. He was cut down to a salary of $6,000, and the rest went into the Treasury. The result is that there has been a good deal of income from these sources. That amount of revenue will be decreased necessarily, because I think the average fees of the consulates abolished will be more than the salaries which they have received.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then the probability is, if the protection of the revenue necessitates the appointment of consuls at those places, whom the President has a right to appoint with the advice and consent of the Senate without any action on the part of the House, and they should be appointed under the general law to be paid by fees, those fees will be more than the salaries they receive now.

Mr. SARGENT. In many of the cases that is likely to be so. Of course the current of trade shifts. One year a consulate may be important and the consul may take a great many fees, and another year there may be some shifting. I should like to say that great discrimination was used in omitting consulates. I have had the advice of the Department; of course they are not satisfied with the bill and I do not wish to misrepresent them as saying that they are satisfied with it. I am not satisfied with it; but under that good advice those which could be best spared have been dropped.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator in respect of the consulates for the salaries of which appropriations are omitted, is there any provision in the bill which authorizes consuls at those places upon fees?

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; they rely upon the general law for that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a general law?

Mr. SARGENT. So I understood. I am so informed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Or does it stand on the Constitution?

Mr. SARGENT. The Constitution relates to the diplomatic service. There is no doubt of the power, however, to appoint consuls to receive fees under the general law. That question I asked and it was answered to me in the affirmative by high authority.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to see the general law to which my friend refers.

Mr. SARGENT. I have not looked it up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can look it up while this report is being printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the honorable Senator whether this bill, being simply a failure to provide the amount of salary, the consuls at the consulates for which appropriations are not made may not hereafter have a claim, assuming that they remain there and perform their duties as consuls, to the amount of their salaries as now fixed by law.

Mr. SARGENT. No; because we have provided in the bill that notice shall at once be given and they shall receive pay for a certain length of time and their transit home. That we have guarded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think as this matter involves a great deal to the public service of the country we ought to take time enough to consider it. There is evidently no hurry. The two Houses do not want to go home. We have staid so long that it is better to stay and do the business understandingly; and to understand the exact bearing of this question which has been so well explained by my friend, I think the report had better be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. It can be printed by nine o'clock this evening.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be. We ought not to be in a hurry. We are paid by the year and we are here protecting the interests of the people.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to make a suggestion. I understand it is very difficult to keep a quorum in the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But we ought to have that respect for the House to suppose that it is full all the time. I want to see what the state of the law is, and for the time being I object to the consideration of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects to the present consideration of the report.

THE RECESS.

Mr. WEST. As this subject is now laid over, I beg to make a suggestion. I understood a short time ago that a motion was made and carried that the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock. I beg to say that that perhaps is ill-advised. There is very little prospect of getting a quorum here to-night for any action, and we shall not make any progress. The Senate is at the end of a long and laborious week, and to press anything to-night will be impracticable. I suggest that the motion had better be reconsidered.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope that the motion to reconsider will not prevail. It seems to me we have got far along with the business, and I understand if we apply ourselves diligently we may adjourn this Congress on Monday or Tuesday; and we ought to do so if we can.

Mr. WEST. Very likely we may. I make the motion, however. I find I am supported by my friend from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and others. I move to reconsider the vote by which the recess was ordered.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope the motion will not be reconsidered; and if the Senator will allow me, I will give my reason very briefly. The House is now acting on the conference report on the legislative bill. The bill will require a great deal of time to enroll; and unless we act upon it to-night it will delay us one or two days next week. If we do not take a recess I think it means at least one or two days longer next week. If we act on the legislative bill to-night it may possibly be ready for signature on Monday.

Mr. WEST. I have elicited enough expression of opinion to satisfy me that probably it is not well to press the motion.

Mr. MORRILL. Withdraw it.

Mr. WINDOM. We may be able to pass the legislative bill to-night.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot pass any appropriations here to-night.

Mr. WEST. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is in favor of a session this evening, and therefore I withdraw the proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has the floor, and may continue his remarks.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest that it be considered five o'clock.

Mr. WEST. "Make it so," as the sailors say.

Mr. SARGENT. We will "make it so."

Mr. GORDON. There is no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the state of the matter?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is proposed that the Senate take its recess at this time, it being within a few minutes of five o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not five o'clock yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware has the floor and will proceed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 24) providing for the postponement of the publication of the Army Regulations.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its amendment to the bill (S. No. 842) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to remove the jail on Judiciary Square to grounds near to the Washington Asylum for the use of the District, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. W. S. HOLMAN of Indiana, Mr. CASEY YOUNG of Tennessee, and Mr. KIMBALL of Wisconsin managers at the conference on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 846) to punish the counterfeiting of trade-mark goods and the sale or dealing in counterfeit trade-mark goods;

A bill (S. No. 852) for the relief of Elisha E. Rice;

A bill (S. No. 944) for the relief of Gilderoy M. Hardy;

A bill (S. No. 990) to remove the political disabilities of Reuben Davis, of Mississippi;

A bill (S. No. 1021) allowing the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails in their new iron steamships;

A bill (S. No. 1036) to provide for the printing and distribution of the reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the years 1874 and 1875;

A bill (H. R. No. 1089) granting a pension to Thomas I. Fox, late a private of Company C, Fifty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1713) for the relief of Berthold Loewenthal, of Chicago, Illinois; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2271) to increase the pension of Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner.

A bill (H. R. No. 3209) to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to receive lands in payment of judgments to eastern band of Cherokee Indians;

A bill (H. R. No. 3359) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3374) for the relief of Harry E. Eastman, late lieutenant-colonel Second Regiment Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 3849) for the relief of James W. Harvey and James Livesey, of the firm of Harvey & Livesey, of Wisconsin;

A bill (H. R. No. 3678) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Lydia to that of Sylph; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

PRINTING OF IMPEACHMENT REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. Perhaps the Senator from Delaware will give way to allow me to call up the bill which I called up this morning, but it was not then printed. The bill came from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will do that, if it will not interfere with my proceeding with my remarks this evening.

Mr. ANTHONY. The bill was taken up this morning, but it was not in print.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask my friend——

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope my friend will not interrupt, because I have only two minutes. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1042) to provide for the publication of the report of the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that 5,000 additional copies of the report of the impeachment trial of William W. Belknap be printed, of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 350 copies for the use of the managers, and 200 copies for the use of the respondent's counsel; and appropriates the sum of $5,030, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the execution of the work.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to take up the other bill in regard to printing, which also had to go over for the same reason.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. No. 1041) to provide for printing the report of the engineers on the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object. It is a perfectly useless appropriation of money, as the other was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island move to proceed to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. I asked to take up both bills, and I thought there was no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. It is five o'clock, I think.

Mr. ANTHONY. This bill is very necessary. We cannot do the printing without the appropriation. I move to take up the bill.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 20, noes 13; no quorum voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of five o'clock having arrived, the Senate takes a recess until half past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate re-assembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is entitled to the floor on the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

ARTIFICIAL LIMBS TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. LOGAN. I dislike to disturb the Senator, but I desire to make a conference report. It will take but a moment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I yield to a conference report.

Mr. SARGENT. With the understanding that it is by common consent and not to disturb the pending business, I shall make no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course, I do not desire to disturb the pending business; but this matter will take but a moment.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1516) to regulate the issue of artificial limbs to disabled soldiers, seamen, and others, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House concur in the first and second amendments of the Senate, as follows:

In line 1 strike out "persons" and insert "officer, soldier, seaman, and marine."

In line 5, after "application," insert "or commutation therefor as provided and limited by existing laws."

The House concurs also in the proviso added to the end of the bill with an amendment of the word "not" inserted between the words "shall" and "be" in the first line; so that it will read: "That this act shall not be subject to the proviso of an act entitled 'An act to increase pensions,' approved June 18, 1874."

JOHN A. LOGAN,
J. B. GORDON,
NEWTON BOOTH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. M. RUSK,
A. V. RICE,
JOHN C. BAGBY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas objects to the present consideration of the report.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

THE HAWAIIAN TREATY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, there are some other matters to which I wish to refer before I close my remarks. The Senator from Minnesota this morning complained and predicted that the economy exhibited on the part of the House of Representatives and the democratic party in cutting down the expenses of the Government and in the curtailment of the appropriations made for the next fiscal year would greatly embarrass the Government. He predicted that all the Departments would be embarrassed by reason of the economy which had been exhibited by the House of Representatives. Now, sir, I predict exactly the contrary. It is not surprising that the Senator and his party who during the last ten or fifteen years have rioted in extravagance and have created offices and made places not necessary for the public service in order that their friends might have employment and be paid out of the public Treasury; it is no wonder that the Senator and his party, accustomed to this extravagance, may fail to see how the Departments can get along with a curtailment of the expenditures. They may apprehend that a small reduction of the clerical force in the Departments will cause embarrassment; but any one who has had occasion to go through all the Departments of the Government cannot have failed to notice that in every Department there seems to be a great excess in the number of the employés about the Departments. You can scarcely pass through one of them but your eye will fall upon a number of idle men, paid at Government expense, walking leisurely through the Department apparently having nothing to do. When I have gone through these Departments, through the Treasury building, through the Patent Office, through the Post-Office, and through all the Departments, I have noticed very frequently a large number of such persons that were the employés of the Government. It may occasion the employés retained a little more labor, but none of them will be so taxed by the duties of the positions which they hold as to find them burdensome and none so taxed, I venture the prediction, that they will be ready to give them up on account of the labor imposed upon them.

I am sorry that any man who has employment has to give it up; I like to see every person making an honest living for himself; but if there are employés in the service of the Government whose services are not necessary to the public, they ought to be dismissed; and I apprehend that, in the honest judgment of such employés, while they may reluctantly have to part with their places, they cannot say that injustice has been done them. The Government will get along, all the Departments will get along with the appropriations that are made this year. I know it has been customary to have a large number of employés and clerks, and at one time some of them not only drew the regular pay allotted to them, but additional pay besides. Only a few years ago, under the administration in the Treasury Department of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] a sum amounting to $22,000 annually over and above the regular pay of the clerks was placed at the disposal of the honorable Senator, whom I see in his seat, and he distributed that in excess of the regular pay to a few of the clerks in his Department. That has been cut off. Attention was called to it. I myself introduced a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for a statement of the amounts which had been paid in excess of the regular salaries, and I had the return here at the very last or preceding session of Congress.

Mr. BOUTWELL. To what does the Senator from Delaware refer?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I refer to a sum of $22,000 that was distributed to clerks in the Treasury Department during the honorable Senator's administration.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know about the $500. I know it was $22,000 at least.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Does not the honorable Senator know that it was by a specific appropriation made by Congress for the specific purpose?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not dispute that. I was not charging that the Secretary of the Treasury unlawfully or without authority of law made any such distribution. I was only complaining that, in excess of the regular salaries of clerks, at one time such had become the extravagance under republican rule that under the administration of the honorable Senator of the Treasury Department——

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator——

Mr. SAULSBURY. Not just now. I will make my statement and then I will hear any explanation the Senator has to make. I was not complaining that the then honorable Secretary of the Treasury, the now honorable Senator from Massachusetts, had unlawfully paid to any clerk in his Department anything without the authority of law; but I was stating as an instance of republican extravagance that the clerks in the Treasury Department, or at least a select few who were getting good salaries, none of them perhaps under $1,800, some of them as high as $2,500, if my recollection serves me, were paid in addition to their regular salaries by an appropriation placed at the disposal and distributed by the Secretary of the Treasury. I was complaining of the extravagance of the republican party, not complaining that the honorable Senator while Secretary of the Treasury had appropriated money without warrant of law.

After an indulgence in such extravagance, after every Department had been filled to overflowing with clerks and employés, after they had been paid most liberal salaries and then in addition to that a bonus, sometimes as high as a thousand dollars, it is no wonder that the honorable Senator from Minnesota and his political associates on the other side of this Chamber, should now apprehend that the curtailment of a few hundred clerks in the Departments of the Government and a curtailment of the expenditures of these Departments will cause some embarrassment. But, sir, you will find no embarrassment. The Government will go on and the Departments will still be run at much less expense and, I predict, fully as efficiently as they have been run heretofore.

The honorable Senator from Minnesota this morning proclaimed that the investigations which have been going on will not work injury or damage to his party. It may be that the American people have become so accustomed to wrong, so accustomed to fraud, so accustomed to extravagance, so accustomed to waste under the administration of the republican party that they may fail to be aroused by those investigations; but I apprehend the Senator will be disappointed in his expectation and desire. When the people of this broad land find revealed by the investigations of a democratic House of Representatives the frauds that have been practiced, the loose administration of the Departments that has been practiced, the extravagance and waste that have been practiced by the republican party, I shall be very much surprised if they do not express at the polls condemnation of all such practices.

We have told them in the past that such was the condition of affairs, but we had no mode of proving it to their satisfaction. We were not in power in the House of Representatives or in the Senate. We could institute no investigations, and when investigations were demanded and awarded, those investigations failed to reach down to the bottom facts and to expose in their full deformity the wrongs that were being perpetrated upon the people of the country. But now, when a democratic House has thoroughly investigated these matters and exposed them to view, I greatly misapprehend the people of this country if they do not put the seal of their condemnation upon the party that has tolerated and covered up such wrongs.

The honorable Senator has forgotten the investigation into the Freedman's Bank located right in view of the presidential mansion, an institution that was got up by republicans, the especial friends of the wards of the nation, and which has resulted in a loss to the poor unfortunate blacks who trusted their friends to an amount of more than $1,000,000 saved out of their scanty earnings. I beg leave to read from the report of the investigating committee what I consider about the best description of the manner in which these poor negroes have been treated by their professed friends. I find the committee's condemnation stated in such forcible language that I shall take occasion to read it. After giving the history of the institution, the manner in which it was got up and in which it was managed and the losses which the poor colored people had sustained, the report goes on to say:

> And now taking a retrospective glance over the events of the last ten years, in which this Freedman's Bank looms up conspicuously, we are led to believe that no race or kindred among all the generations of men have so thoroughly sounded the depths of the philosophy expressed in the prayer, save me from my friends, as those "persons lately held in slavery" at the South, a people over whom more crocodile tears have been shed, on whom more imposition practiced, and for whom less real sympathy felt by their professed friends, than any other known to history—a people almost literally stabbed under the fifth rib with a hug and the salutation, "How is it with thee to-day, my brother?" In regard to this bank, the grossest deception was practiced upon them. They were told it was a Government institution, and its solvency and safety guaranteed by the United States. Missionaries, of whom the chief was Alvord, perambulated the South, mixing religion, politics, education, and teaching the blacks how "to toil and to save," and then trust their hard-earned savings to Alvord and his associates to invest for them, not until, however, they had levied toll for their services in bestowing such inestimable benefits, and for their disinterested labors and sacrifices.

This Mr. Alvord was the president of the institution, one of the political friends of the Senator from Minnesota. These poor colored people were deceived in reference to the character of the institution, and their scanty earnings were gathered up and placed in the bank under his disposal. Some seventy thousand of the depositors in that bank have been cheated out of more than a million of dollars. Our republican friends were in power; they ought to have investigated and known what was going on in that institution. They had chartered the bank, it was run by their friends, and they ought to have investigated it and exposed and stopped the wrongs perpetrated on the colored people; but where has been the investigation into its affairs thoroughly disclosing the whole character of that institution until a democratic House of Representatives brought it to light? True it was known that the institution had failed; true it was known that the money of the colored people in that institution had been lost; but the true facts of the case were never revealed until they were exposed by the democratic House of Representatives.

I have said before and I say now that in my honest judgment the democracy are the true friends of the colored people, and I do not say it because I want them to vote the democratic ticket. Let them vote as they please, but the democrats of the country have always treated them properly and are ready to defend them against the impositions and wrongs that are practiced upon them by their republican friends.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to another subject. I want to know of my republican friends if the revelations made in the investigation of our foreign affairs has not shown that some of your representatives abroad have not been wanting in that elevated character which has heretofore distinguished our diplomatic and consular service. Take your late minister to England. How did he conduct himself as the representative of this great country?

We know something of his history before he went to England. He had some military reputation, not very enviable, it is true. He had also some legislative reputation. It has been said, whether true or not I do not know, that he made a very considerable amount of money when he was a member of the other House of Congress by speculation in the article of whisky upon which he was legislating. I do not know whether that is true or not. But I do know something of his public history as an embassador from this country to the court of St. James. The report which I hold in my hand shows that he became connected with, if not a speculator in, stocks which were placed upon the foreign market and enhanced in marketable value because of his connection with them, and that the people of the country to which he was accredited were cheated out of millions paid for such stocks. Every American must feel humiliated when he remembers that a foreign minister representing the great American people at one of the first courts in the world so far forgot the dignity of his country, so far forgot the duty which he owed to the people he represented abroad as to become connected with speculative schemes which resulted in the robbery of millions from the people of Great Britain. Why was he not recalled? I ask why was not that man brought home? Why was the honor of this country permitted to suffer and our fair reputation to be tarnished by the conduct of our minister at one of the first courts of the world? He was by this investigation dragged from his position and compelled to return and answer imputations against his conduct. By the investigation of the democratic party the turpitude of his action was revealed, and it was only then that he was dismissed. In other instances the character of some of our foreign representatives has been far below the true standard. They will readily suggest themselves, and need not now be cited. I do not mean to say that we have not had some honorable ministers abroad; I do not mean to say that there have not been and are not now in the Cabinet of the United States men of high tone, men of elevated character.

But what I desire to say is this, that at times during the existence of the present Administration there have been men surrounding the President, men in official position, even in Cabinet positions, who have not possessed that elevated tone of character which men in those positions ought to have. The same is true of some of the ministers and other agents that have represented our country in foreign lands.

If the character of the American people were judged by some of our high officials, I fear we should command but little respect at home or abroad. Happily those high in official life and station are not always the exponents of public or private morality. We are not to be judged by the men whom fortuitous circumstances for a time have placed in power and by whose action we have been too often humiliated if not disgraced. The average American sentiment is of a higher tone than that exhibited by many of our public men, especially many of those who owe their prominence and official positions to the present Administration, which in appointments to place has been governed more by a desire to promote the wishes of party or personal friends than to secure the services of efficient, faithful, and honest officials.

For years there have been complaints of our whole civil service. Incompetent and dishonest men have found their way to place and too often been retained long after their corruptions and inefficiency were more than suspected by a discriminating public. Private friendships and party attachments have been more potential with the Administration than the public good, and fewer men have been dismissed for infidelity to trust than supposed infidelity to their chief and the republican party. That stern integrity and unswerving fidelity in the performance of duty formerly exacted of subordinates and officials by all administrations have not been demanded by President Grant and the men who have shaped and controlled his Administration. The consequence has been loose administration of government, wasteful expenditure of the public money, frauds upon the revenue, and a general disregard of the public interest, necessitating the continuance of oppressive taxation upon the people.

The necessity for reform has been seen and admitted by many good men in the republican party, but they have been unable to secure it. The temerity of those who have attempted to bring it about has been punished by Executive displeasure and the disapproval of the party. Is not this so? Trumbull and Schurz and Fenton in this Chamber raised their voices in opposition to corruption and dishonesty in officials, and they fell into disfavor. Bristow sought to protect the revenue and punish the frauds committed upon the Treasury, but Bristow and the men who aided him in the effort have retired to the shade.

Reform in the party has been promised just before every election, but reform has not come. The thieves are stronger than the honest men, and silence and submission have become a necessity to republicans who are unwilling to fall into disfavor in the party. The fact is the party is unable to reform itself, and if reform and improvement in the management of public affairs shall ever take place it must be brought about by the democratic party. There must be a change in the administrators of Government before any decided or healthy improvement can be secured. A continuance of the republican party in power would postpone indefinitely purity in the administration of Government. A mere change of republican rulers would accomplish but little. Mr. Hayes, if elected, would inherit all the vices of the present administration; and, however honest his purpose, however strong his desire to effectuate reform, he would be unable to secure it. The ship of state needs not only a new helmsman but a new crew. She must be cleansed, remanned, and put upon a new tact. The haven of prosperity will never be reached in any other way.

Every interest of the country demands a change of administration, a thorough, a radical change. The party in power has lived for itself. It has sought to continue its own existence and disregarded alike the wishes and interests of the country. The consequence has been retrogression in material wealth and prosperity, depression in business, failure in enterprise, loss of capital, less demand for labor, reduction of wages, dismissal of workingmen from employment, and want and starvation in many families. A change in the management of public affairs or still greater distress and ruin must come. The alternative is presented to the American people of a change of administration that will secure honest government and economy in the expenditures of public money, insuring reduction in taxation and prosperity in business, or of a continuation of that policy and practice which have brought distress upon the country and the wolf to our doors.

In the nominee of the democratic party—a practical reformer, whose life accords with his profession—in his letter of acceptance and the platform upon which he stands we offer to the country an assurance of an honest purpose to reform the administration of Government and restore prosperity to the country. His election would at once inspire confidence and hope, revive industry in every branch of business, and bring gladness and joy to every portion of our common country.

Mr. WEST and Mr. NORWOOD rose.

Mr. WEST. As I do not care to occupy the attention of the Senate, I will give way to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NORWOOD. I do not care to occupy the attention of the Senate upon this bill. If any members of the Committee on Appropriations desire to make their conference reports, I will yield. I understand that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] desires to make a conference report on the legislative bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I insist upon the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California insists on the regular order, which is the Hawaiian bill.

Mr. NORWOOD. I suppose I may yield the floor to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to present the report of the committee of conference on the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Will this displace the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. SARGENT. I am willing that the report shall be made by unanimous consent, with the understanding that it does not displace the business before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the report being made upon those conditions?

Mr. SARGENT. Subject to call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Subject to call? The Chair hears no objection.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I present the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report, and was interrupted by

Mr. McDONALD. I suggest that the substance of this report be stated by the chairman, rather than that we shall have the entire report read. It will not be very intelligible to most Senators after it is read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We had better have a little time to look it over first.

Mr. McDONALD. We might almost as well have the multiplication table before us as have this statement read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The printed report is on our table, and by taking a little time every Senator can understand it, except the mere minutiæ, which the Senator from Minnesota can explain when it comes up for action. I do not propose to have it acted upon at this moment until I understand it.

Mr. WINDOM. Does the Senator from Vermont prefer to have it laid over?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to its being read. I have nothing to say to that.

Mr. WINDOM. Unless the reading can be waived altogether, it had better proceed. If there be no objection, perhaps the reading of it can be dispensed with and the report be taken up fifteen or twenty minutes hence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to be read some time.

Mr. WINDOM. Then it had better be read now.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the report, but was interrupted by Mr. PADDOCK. Is it an essential parliamentary requirement that this report shall be read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has insisted on it. That point has been raised before.

Mr. PADDOCK, (to Mr. EDMUNDS.) Do you insist on the reading of the report?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do. I will never consent to vote on a conference report that has not been read.

Mr. PADDOCK. Here is a bill that has been passed to and fro between these two Houses for two months and been before twenty or twenty-five conference committees, and it seems to me it ought to be understood by this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is so much the more reason for standing by the rules and knowing what sort of product has been produced by this kind of labor.

Mr. PADDOCK. The more conference committees, then the more necessity for reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Decidedly.

Mr. PADDOCK. That is a new rule, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk proceeded with the reading of the report, but was interrupted by Mr. EATON. Is it in order to move to dispense with the further reading?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion has been made and several Senators objected to it. Some of the Senators who objected are out.

Mr. EATON. Is the motion in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. EATON. I make the motion.

Mr. ALLISON. Half an hour will complete the reading.

Mr. EATON. My motion is in order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It will have to be read at some time.

Mr. WINDOM. I think we shall save time by going on with the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the further reading be dispensed with.

Mr. WINDOM. I am satisfied there will be time saved by going on.

Several SENATORS. "Go on."

Mr. KERNAN. Those who require the reading ought to stay and listen.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not desire to have it read myself.

Mr. EATON. Very well; let the reading go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will go on.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report, which is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend ,and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 70, 72, 73, 76, 175, 177, 178, 181, 182, 205, 215, 419, 443, 444, 445, 446, 460, 519, 545, 553, 554, 559, 577, 581, 590, 591, 592, 593, 614, 617, 620, 623, 625, 632, 643, 708, 709, 710, 721, 722, 763, 764, 766, 776, 810, 812, 912, 915, 921, 922, and 944.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 939, and agree to the same, with an amendment striking out the paragraph and inserting the following: "For rent of the four floors of the building occupied by the Department of Justice, $14,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 943, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "four" and insert "three;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 945, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out therefrom "twenty-eight thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-four thousand eight hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 946, and agree to substitute for the same the following:

"SEC. 2. That the reduction in the numerical force of the officers, clerks, and employés in the several Executive Departments made necessary by the provisions of this act shall be carried into effect as follows: The number so reduced shall be discharged on the 10th day of October next, and the sum of money necessary for their compensation to the said date is hereby appropriated. And the amounts of money necessary to carry out the provisions of this act for which no specific appropriations are made are hereby appropriated; and the amounts heretofore appropriated for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses for this fiscal year, so far as the same were applicable to service which by the provisions of this act is discontinued, or to excess of compensation which by this act is reduced, shall not be deducted from the aggregate appropriations herein made for like purposes; and the sum of $60,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for temporary clerical service in the several Executive Departments, according to the exigencies of the public service, to be apportioned by the Secretary of the Treasury. And the President is authorized, during the present fiscal year, whenever the interests of the public service shall require it, to transfer any clerk or employé from one Department to service in another Department."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 947, 948, 949, 950, and 951, and agree to the following substitute for the section:

"SEC. 3. That whenever, in the judgment of the head of any Department, the duties assigned to a clerk of one class can be as well performed by a clerk of a lower class, or by a female clerk, it shall be lawful for him to diminish the number of clerks of the higher grade and increase the number of the clerks of the lower grade within the limit of the total appropriation for such clerical service: Provided, That in making any reduction of force in any of the Executive Departments the head of such Department shall retain those persons who may be equally qualified who have been honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States, and the widows and orphans of deceased soldiers and sailors.

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to institute a careful scrutiny of the present condition and competence of the force employed in the collection of revenue from customs, with a view of reducing the number of the same."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 952, and agree to the text proposed to be stricken out, amended as follows: Strike out therefrom the following words: "except those for whom specific appropriations are made" and insert the following: "beyond provision made by law."

"SEC. —. That all executive officers or employés of the United States not appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, are prohibited from requesting, giving to, or receiving from any other officer or employé of the Government any money or property or other thing of value for political purposes; and any such officer or employé who shall offend against the provisions of this section shall be at once discharged from the service of the United States; and he shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $500.

"SEC. —. To enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry into effect the act of March 3, 1875, to provide for the sale of the buildings and grounds known as the Detroit arsenal, at Dearbornville, in the State of Michigan, by appraising and surveying the property and advertising its sale, $1,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, postpone the time of sale to the time most advantageous to the United States.

"SEC. —. For the purpose of defraying the expenses of a survey of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railways between Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Sacramento, California, to be made in pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives passed the 12th day of July, 1876, $10,000."

And the House agree to the same.

WM. WINDOM,
W. B. ALLISON,
T. F. BAYARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
W. R. MORRISON,
JOHN A. KASSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Clerk to read commencing at section blank on page 65.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC.—. That all executive officers or employés of the United States not appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, are prohibited from requesting, giving to, or receiving from any other officer or employé of the Government any money or property or other thing of value for political purposes; and any such officer or employé who shall offend against the provisions of this section shall be at once discharged from the service of the United States; and he shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $500.

SEC. —. To enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry into effect the act of March 3, 1875, to provide for the sale of the buildings and grounds known as the Detroit Arsenal, at Dearbornville, in the State of Michigan, by appraising and surveying the property and advertising its sale, $1,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, postpone the time of sale to the time most advantageous to the United States.

SEC. —. For the purpose of defraying the expenses of a survey of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railways between Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Sacramento, California, to be made in pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives passed the 12th day of July, 1876, $10,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order as to these last sections that they were never in the House bill, or anything on the subject, or in any of the Senate amendments; and that contrary to the rules of parliamentary propriety the conferees have gone entirely outside of their jurisdiction and imported these provisions entirely fresh into the bill. Therefore I object to the report being received.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not wish to say anything on the point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That has been settled too often.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to appeal to the Senator from Vermont to take into consideration the circumstances of this bill and former practices and content himself with giving notice for the future. If he chooses to read a lecture on obedience to the rules, it will be received very kindly, and it will be very substantially followed hereafter, so far as any influence I may have is concerned, but I appeal to him to withdraw the point of order. The fact is that this bill has passed through unusual tribulations. For thirty-three or thirty-four days and nights it has been on our hands. I think there is less of that objectionable legislation in it than has usually been in bills of this character, although that is no excuse for this. I agree with the Senator from Vermont that it ought not to be done, and I think it is an evil that will be remedied hereafter without the necessity for postponing this bill upon the point of order. There is, certainly, no very serious objection in themselves to the amendment. With the permission of the Senator I will state—I know this is not upon the point of order, but it is only in sustaining my appeal to the Senator from Vermont—that under the first of these sections committing to the Secretary of the Interior, as we have done, discretion as to the time of sale, there can be no great damage. Under the last clause to which the point of order is raised, I think a good deal of good will be accomplished, although perhaps that is not a reason why it should be included in the bill as against the rule. The committee were informed and believed the fact to be true that it has recently been ascertained that there are some fifty miles more of the Union Pacific Railroad paid for than really exist, and it was thought desirable to have the measure inserted, as probably from half a million to two million dollars will be saved by it.

I have nothing to say on the point of order. I understand the point of order better than I did in the conference committee; but I appeal to the Senator to let the bill go through.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course the Senate is perfectly aware that the point is well taken, and a point of order that ought to be taken on every occasion of this character, as it generally is. I, of course, do not intend, after I get the ruling of the Chair, to insist upon it, because these particular provisions are not obnoxious, so far as I know; but I make it in order that it shall not grow up to be the practice of this body to tolerate this violation of the rules of propriety and procedure, and by and by, as instances make order, as the phrase is, we shall find that it is in order for the conferees to put in whatever they like that the two Houses never heard of, and force us to take it at the end of the session, as in this case, because they put it in rather than to lose the bill. Therefore, in order to prevent the establishment of a bad precedent, I will make the point of order, and if, of course, as I have no doubt, the Chair shall sustain it, I shall at once withdraw it, with unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont makes the point of order that new matter has been introduced which was not submitted to the conferees. The Chair will sustain the point of order, at the same time saying, as it is a matter of grave importance, that if the Senator insists upon it, the Chair will refer it to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wish the Chair to state what the rule is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my point of order and let the objection be waived.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to give notice that I shall never withdraw it again, except—no, I will not make any exception.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate concur in the report of the committee of conference, and I think that the best explanation I can make of these nine hundred and odd amendments will be to submit the printed report and await any question that may be put to me. It is utterly impossible, as we have passed the bill, to make a full explanation. It has already been somewhat fully explained, and unless it be desired by Senators I will not take the time to make an explanation.

The report was agreed to.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is now before the Senate, being the bill in relation to the Hawaiian treaty.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to appeal to the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to permit the further consideration of the report presented by him upon the consular and diplomatic bill. I think we ought to finish that before we adjourn to-night, and I think he will consent to lay aside the regular order for that purpose.

Mr. SARGENT. I will do so, laying aside the regular order informally to come up again at the conclusion of the report. I ask that the question be taken upon the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the conference report upon the consular and diplomatic bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has it been read?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was read before the recess.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not ask for it, except that I should like to have the last clause read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of such diplomatic and consular officers heretofore compensated by salaries for whose salaries no appropriation is made by this act such amount as shall be necessary to pay their salaries as fixed by law until they shall have notice to close their offices, which notice shall be at once sent to them by the Secretary of State, and for the time allowed by law for transit from their respective posts to their places of residence, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have my friend from California state what are these offices that the Secretary of State is ordered to cause to be closed.

Mr. SARGENT. The offices for which no provision is made in the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The offices which this clause says the Secretary of State shall notify at once to be closed?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir. For instance, he will send word to the ministers at Portugal, Switzerland, Bolivia, Ecuador, and also to the consuls at Swatow, Southampton, Oporto, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say that if there is any executive branch of the Government left under this reform Congress, I supposed that under the Constitution it did not belong to Congress to determine when a particular officer should be turned out and ordered home. I did not suppose it was competent for Congress to declare that some minister at some foreign court or some consul should be directed by the Secretary of State to close up his office and either come home or go elsewhere as he liked, to stop his office and turn him out. I supposed the law was perfectly plain that that sort of thing belonged to an independent and separate department of the Government; and while of course I have no expectation of preventing the acceptance of this report, and as a practical fact I have no disposition that I know of—we must get out some way—I want, as I did on the other occasion about the matter of order and parliamentary propriety, to put in for one a caveat that I do not agree to any such law as that. Even if Congress has the power to abolish the office of a consul, so that no such office exists, it is quite a different thing from undertaking to exercise the power of directing that a particular officer or a particular number of officers, named as they are by reference, shall close up their offices and clear out. It is as plain a violation of the independent rights of a co-ordinate branch to the Government, to my mind, as could possibly be stated. I may be wrong; but that is my opinion, and I take this opportunity to express it so that nobody hereafter will say to me that I have assented to legislation of that character.

Mr. SARGENT. The conferees on the part of the Senate were confronted with this difficulty: We made no appropriation for certain offices, contrary to our opinion of what ought to be done, knowing thereby that, pro tanto, the service was injured and crippled; but it would take some months to get word to ministers and consuls in various parts of the earth that there was no salary provided for them, and hence there was a necessity for them to return home. Unless provision was made for their payment for that interval, and also that which the law provides for their transit home, they might be left in a very embarrassing situation. Their salaries at best, many of them, are small. They might not have the means to get home; and from being representatives of America abroad, keeping up to some extent the dignity of their positions they might be turned to beggars and compelled to borrow money or to beg it in order to get home. It was necessary to provide a fund to get them home. If a fund was provided, it was necessary to place some limitation upon the expense which would be incurred. It would be a charge upon that fund, and I do not know of any apter words that I could use to express it than to say that notice should be sent to them at once; that on their receiving it they should come home; and that they should be paid for the time which elapsed to get it and for their transit home. That was the difficulty which we encountered. I admit the criticism of the Senator. It was a very difficult problem to deal with, and I thought it was the best we could do under the circumstances.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my honorable friend from California will not suppose that I am making a criticism upon the object he had in view. I was only saying that in my humble opinion this particular clause, to which I have referred, commanding the closing of certain offices named by reference, was a palpable violation, under the Constitution, of the rights of the executive department of the Government; that is all. The motive that he has stated was a very good, and a proper, and a very necessary one, if I can use that as applied to motive. That I entirely agree to. I should have been very sorry to have had the Senate assent to these salaries being abolished, to take effect from the passage of the act, and no provision at all made for these people who have been kept on beggarly salaries before to get home. That would have been cruel; but what I do say is that taking the language of the act as it stands it amounts so far as I can understand, and my friend seems to agree to that, to be assuming a power in Congress to declare that any public minister or officer at any place, because Congress seems to be dissatisfied with him or his service or for any reason, shall cease his functions and retire, not abolishing the office, which may be another thing, but abolishing him, which, so far as I have understood the Constitution, is a power that does not belong to Congress.

Mr. HOWE. I am not going to criticise the action of those Senators who have represented this body in these prolonged conferences on the consular and diplomatic bill. I partly know something of the strain to which they have been subjected, the difficulties that they have had to encounter, and the extreme labor which has been imposed upon them. I am bound to assume and really believe that they have not only done the best of which they were capable, but I have every reason to believe that they have done as well as could be done under the circumstances which confronted them. But I cannot see the Senate acquiesce in the result to which they have been forced without expressing my extreme regret and mortification—I will use that expression—that they should have been driven to a result which I think so unbecoming and so humiliating to the Republic.

Mr. President, if we had been driven by stress of circumstances or stress of politics to reduce the clerical force in your Departments one-fourth or one-half, we could have submitted to that without any dishonor in the eyes of the world. All you could say of that is that your work would not be done. You could have consolidated all the Auditors in the Treasury Department into one and the worst that could have happened would be that your accounts would not have been adjusted, your obligations would not have been met. You could have reduced the salaries of the heads of your Cabinet one-half or three-fourths, and the worst that would happen from that would be that such members of the Cabinet as were able to support themselves, which they now do in a great measure, would have only had to draw a few more thousands out of their own pockets, and as to such of those ministers as are dependent upon their salaries for support, we could have taken up contributions for them in the churches, or given them now and then a donation party, and so eked out their support. But this mania for a reduction in your expenses has not fallen so heavily upon the domestic service. It has struck hard the foreign service and just at that branch of service which I think should not have been struck at all.

For the first time in the history of the Republic we can say that since the close of the late war the Government of the United States has exerted something like its due weight and influence in the councils of nations. I am gratified, not to say proud, to believe that in the rank of nations the United States stands at the front. Our councils are sought for, are listened to, are respected.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. EATON. Has not the United States occupied for the last thirty years a front rank among the nations of the earth?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir.

Mr. EATON. Not under the administration of Jackson?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir. I may have misunderstood what was the front rank of nations thirty years ago.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He means the skirmish line.

Mr. HOWE. She was not on the skirmish line by a long shot. I was even less acquainted with her diplomacy then than I am now. I am sorry to make the confession, but my judgment is that the United States has been lifted within the last ten years 50 per cent. in the scale of influence and of weight.

Now, sir, you cannot carry contributions to your consuls or to your ministers abroad; and after all our gasconade about republican simplicity, it does not pay well at the court of London or Paris or the court of any other first-class foreign power. It is not a good market for it. To have there the influence which belongs to this country, you must maintain ministers not only of intellectual force and power, but you must maintain them somewhat in the guise, if not in the character, of gentlemen. They cannot borrow clothes to attend an evening party. They cannot exert the power we expect of them in the arena of politics without maintaining something of a social position. They cannot do that for nothing. They cannot do that without an adequate compensation. I am glad to learn that some ministers have escaped being scaled down. I am sorry to learn that other ministers have been not exactly cashiered but have been supplanted.

Mr. SARGENT. Do I understand my friend? There have been no ministers whatever scaled down. We have not changed a salary.

Mr. HOWE. I am speaking of your law. I am speaking of your appropriation.

Mr. SARGENT. I am speaking of the appropriation bill myself. We have not reduced the salary of any minister whatever or any consul.

Mr. HOWE. But you have not appropriated for them.

Mr. SARGENT. There are twenty-two consulates not appropriated for.

Mr. HOWE. And some ministers.

Mr. SARGENT. Seven or eight.

Mr. HOWE. That is what I am speaking of.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator spoke of their being scaled down. I thought that referred to salaries.

Mr. HOWE. I was not speaking of a change of the law.

Mr. SARGENT. We resisted the reduction of salaries because we believed the amount allowed by law was not more than sufficient to maintain them half respectably abroad.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator understands, as I explained at the outset, that it was not the purpose of any remark I had to make to criticise the action of the conferees on the part of the Senate. I am speaking of the result.

Mr. SARGENT. I was only anxious my friend should understand the case, and I see that he does. I misapprehended him.

Mr. HOWE. I am speaking of the unfortunate result. I think it is to be regretted that at this time we should actually advertise to the world that we cannot afford to maintain even third-class ministers at several very important European courts, and at several other South American governments. Perhaps there is more political significance in keeping up, maintaining the position we have already assumed here on this continent than there is abroad; but I think the importance of both these positions towers in comparison with the importance of the sum of money which it costs the people of the United States to maintain them.

Mr. President, I do not mean to detain the Senate; I feel this matter rather more acutely than I care to give expression to. I could have borne meager appropriations in various directions with more equanimity than I regard them in this particular one, but it is a question which concerns not me, but the American people. They will consider it, and will pass judgment for or against it. I await their judgment. If they disapprove of this, it can be corrected hereafter. I shall expect at no very distant day to see the Government of the United States return and re-occupy the position which to some extent I think it abandons at this time by the acceptance of this report.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I can sympathize with the conferees in this matter, for I have been on a committee of conference upon this bill. I am very sorry that the nation is brought to this strait. The destruction of the poor is their poverty. If a planter has a fine plantation and cannot stock it, if a merchant has a good stock of goods and cannot employ clerical force, if a professional man has a good education and cannot get a library, his poverty is his destruction. It is equally true that affectation of poverty by the rich is the destruction of the rich. The result is the same if the policy is the same, whether the poverty be affected or actual. If we say to the world that we are so poor that we cannot keep up our diplomatic relations, we are disgraced before the world. If we say that we cannot keep up our clerical force, our Government suffers. If we say we cannot pay officials properly, we must take those of a lower grade. In a word, if we run this nation on the basis of poverty, we damage it.

But, Mr. President, this nation is not poor. In 1860 we had a debt, I believe, of $90,000,000, which had accumulated in time of peace, and when we undertook to borrow we paid 12 per cent. interest. Now a large part of our entire debt is funded at 5 per cent., none of it is over 6 per cent., and we can fund it at 4½ probably. That does not look like poverty. We have reduced our interest account since 1867 from $143,000,000 to $103,000,000 a year. We pay $30,000,000 of our debt every year. The balance of trade last year in our favor was $120,000,000, which is just so much money paid into our Treasury. That does not look like poverty.

Mr. President, is it not true that we as a nation, whatever may be the condition of the people—and this question does not affect the people, for there has been no lowering of taxation—are affecting poverty in order that we may display to the public pretended virtues of extraordinary economy and frugality? I believe that to be the case.

Mr. FERRY, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Mr. President, I also sympathize with the conferees, much more than I do with the policy of their report. The chairman of the conference committee has stated that twenty-two consulates have virtually been abandoned because the bill fails to make appropriations for the consuls. I suppose one case would be a type for all, and as we are generally better informed of those that are nearer home, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from California and also of the Senate to the case of the consul at Windsor, opposite to the city of Detroit. There is the western terminus of the Great Western Railway opposite a city of a hundred thousand population, a port of entry. The goods imported at the port of Detroit are scattered from that port throughout the whole West; goods for Cincinnati, Saint Louis, Chicago, Milwaukee, and all the western cities are entered there, and yet the consulate at Winsor, receiving the petty salary of $1,500 in gold, whose fees more than pay his salary and that of all the consular agents connected with that consulate, is stricken out. Now, what is the consequence? Not a certificate can be issued, because there is no consul there, and parties own-owning the goods that are exported from there to the United States must go to Sarnia, a distance of seventy miles, I think. Not only is that so as to goods coming that way, but it is true as to goods coming on the southern railway at Trenton. Thus you have the business of two great thoroughfares to be provided for; and yet with a simple salary of $1,500 you have been driven to withhold the appropriation in order that you may enconomize on that scale. I desire the Senator to give a little explanation.

Mr. SARGENT. I can explain it in several ways. It may be proper for me to say that Windsor, Canada, was struck out originally in the House bill. It was one of the forty consulates left out. In studying this bill I went very carefully through the details and examined the debate in the House on the various items. I found quite a number of consulates which were proposed to be struck out and which were finally struck out and which in the House elicited a great deal of debate and a very instructive debate, but I found no reference at all to Windsor, Canada, as being of any consequence. Of course I knew its location and that it probably was as important as many others; but there was certainly nothing in the House debates to call my attention to it.

Furthermore, in making up this report after the proposition was submitted to the Senate conferees, we took the best advice we could from the Department as to where reduction would do the least harm to the service. It is unquestionable, in the opinion of the Department, and in my opinion, that we have done some harm to the service; still harm had to be done, and it seemed that Windsor could go out as well as La Rochelle could go out, or Swatow could go out, or Southampton and others I have mentioned, and perhaps better than some other consulates. In some cases people have to go more than seventy miles. In some cases the inconvenience would be very much greater.

Mr. MORRILL. May I inquire of the Senator from California if this is not one of the consulates provided for that might allow of the appointment of a consul for the fees?

Mr. SARGENT. A consular agent unquestionably can be appointed to be paid out of the fees. A consul cannot be appointed to be paid out of the fees, because the law says, which is not repealed under the sentiment of the Senate, that consuls at certain places named in schedules B and C shall be paid a certain salary, and if the Department were to appoint consuls to places named in schedules B and C they would be put back on a salary necessarily by law, and that would be contradictory of the action of Congress.

Mr. MORRILL. Then it will probably result in a consular agent being appointed and receiving fees for certificates to the amount of two or three times the consular salary.

Mr. SARGENT. That would be pretty nearly so. In cases of fifteen-hundred-dollar salaries there would be no saving. There would be a loss on all consulates where the amount was a thousand dollars, provided fees to the extent of a thousand dollars or over were collected, because the consular agent is entitled to a thousand dollars out of the fees, and then the consul to whom he is assigned or in whose district he is in also receives a certain proportion of the fees if the fees are collected. Probably for a fifteen-hundred-dollar consulate it would be about even. There is one consulate here of $3,500.

Mr. FERRY. I stated that the fees of this consulate were larger than the salary of the consul and larger than the salary of the consular agents. I understand that under the fee system the salary would be about $2,000, and the consul is paid to-day $1,500. That is a strange policy, and I want to call the attention of the Senator from California to the fact that his general knowledge must have made him familiar with the fact that the Michigan Central road passes all its traffic through Windsor. He is not unaware of that fact.

Mr. SARGENT. No; I have often traveled over it.

Mr. FERRY. Certainly the attention of the conference committee must have been directed to the great importance of that consulate in connection with the traffic of that road.

Mr. SARGENT. Where you have a service which is complete in every part, which was organized upon the very best principles that could be suggested to Congress only two years ago, when unimportant consulates were dropped or made fee consulates, and when those that were important were retained and made salaried, how are you going to touch the service without doing some harm? The Senator can show me that in this particular instance harm was done. So can Senators in other cases. I do not deny it. I do not deny that in every case where a consul has been dropped here some harm may have been done. In many of the cases undoubtedly it has been done; but will you tell me how, where a system has been so recently revised according to the best knowledge and according to existing trade, it can be cut down without doing harm? If it can be done I should like to know it.

Mr. FERRY. I understood the objection was not so much to the character of the service as to the expenditure of the service. As I understood, the object of the conference committee was to reduce expenditure. I stated a fact in connection with this consulate showing that this measure does not reduce the expenditure; and if this be a type of the rest of the twenty-two, how is it that you have not reduced expenditure in effectuating the policy you have sought?

Mr. SARGENT. I have not said that the object of the Senate conferees in dealing with this service which was so recently re-organized by Congress was to reduce expenses. I stated that the best the House would offer us was one-half the difference between the two Houses, saying to us, "Put the money where you think it will do the most good."

Mr. FERRY. Or the most hurt.

Mr. SARGENT. The most good according to our discretion. They gave us the discretion which enabled us to prevent the repealing of law. They only would give us a certain amount of money, and they say, "You distribute it." That is the best perhaps we could get from them, and we did distribute it the way we thought would do the least harm.

Mr. FERRY. Then in the judgment of the Senator it would do the least harm to abolish such consulates as that to which I have called attention.

Mr. SARGENT. I say the consulates were abolished the abolition of which did the least harm in our best judgment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Michigan before he sits down that he will perceive by the state of the law which was passed in 1868 and is now in the Revised Statutes, to be sure passed under a republican administration and which therefore must be bad, but otherwise well enough, that it provides:

> All moneys received for fees at any vice-consulates or consular agencies of the United States, beyond the sum of $1,000 in any one year, and all moneys received by any consul or consul-general from consular agencies or vice-consulates in excess of $1,000 in the aggregate from all such agencies or vice-consulates, shall be accounted for to the Secretary of the Treasury and held subject to his draft or other directions.

So that if it is lawful to appoint a vice-consul or consular agent at a place where the consul is by this mandate of Congress dismissed from office—assuming that to be lawful, upon which I express no opinion—if you can have any officer at all he must be a vice-consul or a consular agent, and his compensation is limited by law to the sum of $1,000, and he is obliged by law to collect just the same fees that he did before, but he must turn them over.

Mr. FERRY. I understood the Senator from California to state—I have not given especial attention to it myself—that in addition to the salary of a thousand dollars he shared with the consulate to which he was attached in the fees. In that event the salary in the case to which I allude would be about $2,000.

Mr. SARGENT. No, I think not. I do not think so large a proportion is allowed to the consul to whom the agent is attached or whose officer he is. The exact proportion I cannot state. A consul may have three or four consular agents under him and he supervises their accounts and directs them. Each of them, if the fees are large, receives $1,000, and then for the money passing through his hands and his general direction he receives a certain percentage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He receives $1,000 himself for all his agencies.

Mr. SARGENT. That is what he receives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If he has twenty agencies he only gets a thousand dollars out of all.

Mr. SARGENT. Excuse me. The agent receives $1,000 and the consul to whom he is accredited receives in addition, if the fees allow, a percentage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg the Senator's pardon. This is what the act says:

> All moneys received for fees at any vice-consulates or consular agencies of the United States, beyond the sum of $1,000 in any one year, and all moneys received by any consul or consul-general from consular agencies or vice-consulates in excess of $1,000 in the aggregate from all such agencies or vice-consulates, shall be accounted for to the Secretary of the Treasury, and held subject to his draft or other directions.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand that perfectly, and it is entirely consistent with what I say. They are accounted to the Treasury, but the Senator will observe that no consul except a salaried consul has a consular agent. He receives his salary in the amount we appropriate in the bill, and an addition is allowed, by a separate section which the Senator will find in the statutes, a certain proportion of the fees collected by his agents. These are paid to him out of the Treasury on draft.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You are now speaking of a consul who is appointed not in any of the schedules, but dependent upon fees.

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; I am speaking of a consular agent who depends on fees and I am speaking of the consul to whom he is accredited who is in schedule B or C.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I submit to my honorable friend that that class of consuls in schedules B and C, like those who are now recalled, have their salaries fixed by law, and in respect to what they are to get at the places where they are not themselves and have consular agents or vice-consuls, the law expressly says that, if they have more or less, a thousand dollars in the aggregate shall be the maximum that they get out of that business.

Mr. SARGENT. Either I do not understand the Senator or he does not understand me; but I am positive this is the law, that in addition to the $1,500 or $2,000 which may be fixed as the salary of a consul who has a consular agent, he is entitled to certain fees collected by the consular agent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He is entitled to a thousand dollars out of those fees, as this statute says, and no more.

Mr. SARGENT. The consular agent or vice-consul.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it says the principal consul or consul-general out of all moneys received by his vice-consuls or consular agents shall be entitled to a thousand dollars in the aggregate from all such agencies or vice-consulates, and all in excess of that shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury.

Mr. SARGENT. Exactly. That is so. If he has one agent who collects a thousand dollars out of his own fees, which pays him, and another thousand dollars, that thousand dollars will go to the consul or consul-general; but if he has five agents under him, he cannot get more than a thousand dollars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it.

Mr. SARGENT. And it would be added to his salary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that on the whole all that a consul or consul-general can get out of vice-consulates and consular agents in any case is a thousand dollars.

Mr. SARGENT. Exactly; whether he has one or five. Take the case of Windsor. Suppose there is a consular agent there and he collects $3,000. He is assigned to the consul at Sarnia. The Sarnia consul may have a salary of $3,000. The consular agent gets his thousand dollars and the consul at Sarnia gets his salary fixed by law and a thousand dollars besides.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is correct.

Mr. FERRY. Then it is narrowed down to this: Instead of having a consul at Windsor at $1,500 you have a consular agent; you degrade the rank, and instead of saving money the Government actually loses $1,000 at the Sarnia consulate, and, deducting the saving here, there is a net loss to the Government of $500 instead of a saving under this economical policy.

I did not rise because I thought it would avail anything, for this report will be adopted; but I wanted to call the attention of the Senate to this illustration and to enter in this manner my protest against such a policy.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I merely rise to state my reasons for being compelled to vote against the adoption of this report. It seems to me the objection urged by the Senator from Vermont is of so serious a character that it cannot be disregarded by the Senate. These offices are established by laws passed by Congress and approved by the Executive. In this bill there is no attempt by legislation to change the law establishing these offices or either of them. The report purports only to refuse appropriations under existing laws, and in the clause referred to directs that in cases where no appropriation is given by the act the offices shall be closed and the Secretary of State is directed to give the notice to the occupant; and it allows a certain amount for the time allowed by law for transit from their respective posts to their places of residence, and makes an appropriation of $25,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary.

By the Constitution the power of nominating and, with the consent of the Senate, appointing these officers is conferred upon the President. The Constitution has taken great care to define exactly the powers of the different branches of the Government, and I regard as a most serious danger any attempt on the part of one of the branches of this Government to interfere with the prerogatives of the other. I certainly would object to any infringement upon the rights of the legislative branch of the Government by the Executive as I would by the legislative upon any other branch of the Government. This attempt then is in this report, if it shall be adopted, to control the action of the Executive in a point where the power is conferred upon him by the Constitution. It is therefore certainly unconstitutional, and the appropriation of $25,000 made in pursuance of such a provision would be a nullity, and to draw such sum or any portion of it from the Treasury by the Executive would be without authority of law. The whole provision it seems to me is such a serious infringement upon the power of the Executive and such an unauthorized exercise of power by the legislative branch of the Government that I cannot in my place give any countenance to it. I shall therefore vote against this report.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, no other Senator on this side having spoken, I rise to say a word with regard to this report.

We have been told by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, if I correctly understand him, that we are disgraced abroad because we change the class of our diplomatic agents. Sir, it has been the habit of Great Britain for two hundred years again and again and again to change the class of her diplomatists without taking into consideration what the opinion of other nations of the earth may be. Sir, that is the duty of the United States. I am not now talking about the propriety or legality of it. That is another matter. I am now talking with regard to the position that the United States will occupy in the community of nations, when she proposes either to change the class of a mission or to dismiss a mission entirely. If this country is to be disgraced at all in this matter, it is to be disgraced here by language of this character, and not by our pursuing a course that we believe to be entirely proper either upon legal or economical or any other rules.

Sir, there is another thing with regard to the diplomacy of the country that I desire to speak of for one moment. I have not the time to go into the history of this matter and go back half a score of thousand years, five hundred, to show why ministers were accredited originally in modern Europe from one state to another. Every Senator understands this matter thoroughly. There is no more necessity today for a minister at the court of Great Britain than there is at the court of Dahomey; not a particle. With the cable when you can get your information in three hours, there is absolutely no necessity for it; and there never will be a difficulty settled between this country and Great Britain or this country and France or this country and Germany at either of the capitals of the several countries. It will be done at Geneva; it will be done at Charleston; it will be done at Boston; it will be done at Washington; it will be done at Paris; and it will not be done by Edwards Pierrepont, or whatever his name may be; but it will be done by a commission appointed by the Government of the United States to attend to it.

Sir, if we have got any dirty linen to wash, we had better wash it in the back rather than in the front yard. What, come in on the floor of the Senate of the United States and say that this country is disgraced because it does not want a minister in Switzerland! Am I mistaken? I ask my friend from California, have you provided for the pay of a minister at Switzerland?

Mr. SARGENT. We have not.

Mr. EATON. I am glad of it. There is no more necessity for a minister at Switzerland than there is at any other point that can possibly be named where you do not want a consular agent. Switzerland has no minister here. It does not want any here. There is no necessity for one here, nor is there any necessity in Switzerland for a minister from this country. There is a necessity for a commercial agent of the highest character, a consular agent of the highest character, for there is a good deal of business between this country and that community, that republic in the heart of Europe. There is no earthly necessity for a diplomatic agent. Many of my friends over the way have traveled there. They know it. I know it, personally know it. There is no necessity for a minister at Switzerland. And now, Mr. President, when, if possible, we propose to reduce the expenditures of this Government, I trust in a proper manner, I trust in a legal manner, I trust in a way to bring as little injury to the service either at home or abroad as is possible, the idea that there is any disgrace to be attached to this Government of ours and this country of ours is a fallacy. Let us do what we believe to be right and proper, as Great Britain does and has done over and over again, as I said before, as France does and has done over and over and over again. We do it because we choose to do it, because we believe it to be right and just and proper, and we do not regard the opinion of any other people in such a matter. That is our business, and not the business of any other people. I shall live a great many years yet, I trust, and I never shall learn during all those years that a proper care for the expenditures of the Government either at home or abroad will disgrace this people in the eyes of any other people on the face of the earth. Language of that character, in my judgment, belittles this Government, this people, this country. Let us do what we believe to be just and right and proper, and do not let us take into consideration what Mrs. Grundy will say in London or Mr. Grundy in Paris. Let us act for ourselves.

One word now to my honorable friend from Wisconsin. We have suddenly, in his opinion, almost I should suppose miraculously within a short time leaped as it were into the front rank of the great nations of the earth. Sir, according to my reading of the history of the world the United States has occupied that front rank among the nations of the earth for a quarter of a century. I rejoice that I agree with my friend that we occupy that position to-day. I would that he could agree with me that we have occupied it for many years. If this country ever stood higher in the opinion of the world than it did during the administration of Andrew Jackson, when was it? Why was it? Where was it? Sir, when that illustrious President of the United States determined that a certain matter should be settled, it was settled. It did not require a committee of conference to settle it either. It was settled because of the character of the Administration. Sir, this Government has never stood higher in the opinion of the world than it did during the administration of Andrew Jackson. I do not say it stood higher then than it does now. God forbid; I trust not. I have no desire to draw a parallel between the condition of my country thirty years ago and to-day. I loved it then. I love it now. I believed then that it stood foremost among the powers of the earth. I believe it does to-day. Sir, permit me to say, too, that I think it stands there to-day through the action of the Secretary of State more than through the action of any other of the Departments of this Government. I pay honor where honor is due. But I cannot sit here silent in my seat and hear Senators say that the country is disgraced because it proposes to enter upon a system of proper expenditures. I cannot sit here quietly and hear Senators say that this country did not occupy a foremost position among the powers of the earth thirty years ago as well as to-day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What I said, Mr. President, was this, which has called forth the criticism of the Senator from Connecticut: that we were engaged in an affectation of poverty, and that if, as we were doing, we withdrew our ministers for the apparent reason that we were too poor to maintain them, it would disgrace us in the eyes of the nations of the world. Wealth with individuals is of but little importance, but the character of a nation depends upon its wealth and its material ability.

My friend from Connecticut said that we do not send these ministers there because we choose not to send them. There, I think, he is greatly mistaken. We choose to send them. The Senate, the Congress, the President have united in enacting laws that they should be sent. We do not send them because we cannot send them; because the House of Representatives, that has a peculiar interest in the welfare of this nation, refuses to make the appropriations to execute the laws.

Mr. SARGENT. I hope we shall have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

JUDGMENTS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. SARGENT. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is House bill No. 612, on which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NORWOOD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me to report a bill from the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. NORWOOD. With pleasure.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not think it will take any time.

Mr. SARGENT. I consent only on condition that it does not set aside the regular order. If we have unanimous consent for that, very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not displace the regular order, which is informally laid aside subject to call.

Mr. WINDOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1044) making appropriations to pay judgments of the Court of Claims, to report it without amendment, and ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $800,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay judgments of the Court of Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE HAWAIIAN TREATY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor on the bill (H. R. No. 612) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, signed on the 30th day of January, 1875, which is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NORWOOD. Mr. President, it is now twenty minutes past ten o'clock, which is about my bed-time. A friend suggests that I have just risen. I make an appeal to the Senator who has charge of this bill and ask him whether he will force me to go on at this hour of the night?

Mr. SARGENT. If there can be consent to have the final vote taken on the bill at any reasonable time on Monday, I will not insist on proceeding further to-night. Otherwise, I want to insist that we go on with the bill. If the Senate will allow a vote to be taken at one o'clock on Monday or two o'clock on Monday, I will consent to yield.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say that if you are going to adjourn now, I shall ask the Senate on Monday, pretty early in the morning, to take up on its passage the resolution from the House of Representatives proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States, and shall ask everybody, of all parties and faiths, to take hold and pass it in a short time.

Mr. SARGENT. I give notice that I shall insist on this business until it is finished; and I ask the friends of this legislation to stand by me in that course. I am not responsible for the course that has been taken in the Senate to-day. Some five hours were taken in political speeches instead of being devoted to this bill. I allowed of course the important conference reports to be acted on. That I thought was due to the business of the Senate; but otherwise I shall insist and ask the friends of this legislation to stand by me till the bill is passed or defeated. I am willing to fix an hour on Monday when the final vote shall be taken on the bill, and I promise, so far as I am concerned, that in the intervening time I will not occupy ten minutes of the time of the Senate.

Mr. WEST. Will my friend from Georgia yield to me a moment to make a motion——

Mr. NORWOOD. I will hear what the motion is.

Mr. WEST. I shall merely preface my motion by a few remarks, and it will be a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SARGENT. Which will cut off any discussion.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope that motion will not prevail if it is made.

Mr. WEST. I believe I am entitled to the floor. It is evident that if this thing is persisted in to-night we shall have to sit here and endure with as much patience as we can the further arguments on the questions which are to be made, as I understand by my friend from Vermont who sits on my right [Mr. MORRILL] and by several Senators on the other side of the Chamber, and undoubtedly we shall be occupied here until the small hours of the morning. If the Senate is prepared for that, well and good; but in order to give it an opportunity to express its opinion, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield to me one moment?

Mr. WEST. For what purpose?

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to move that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet on Monday at ten o'clock.

Mr. WEST. I have no objection to that; but I want to know whether, if I yield the floor for that purpose, I lose the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator would lose the floor. A Senator yielding the floor loses it absolutely by strict rule; but the contrary has been the practice of the Senate.

Mr. WEST. Then I insist on my motion to adjourn.

Mr. SARGENT. There is a large quorum of the Senate here, and I ask that we proceed with this business to-night.

Mr. WEST. I insist on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WEST. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAYTON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.] I do not know whether he would vote to adjourn or not. I will vote if my vote is needed to make a quorum, and I understand it is.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 7, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clayton, Cockrell, Davis, Gordon, Key, McCreery, and West—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Cooper, Cragin, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Mitchell, Paddock, Sargent, Spencer, Stevenson, Wadleigh, Windom, and Withers—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conkling, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Merrimon, Morrill, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Wright—35.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me a moment?

Mr. SARGENT. I am willing to make an agreement that this vote shall be taken at any reasonable time on Monday and I think I can promise that the friends of the bill will not occupy time. I can make a promise as far as I am concerned that I will not occupy over ten minutes. This is at the heel of the session. If Senators do not want to stay here to-night I do not want to compel them to remain; but it seems to me reasonable after the time has been occupied to-day on other matters that the Senate should consent that this important measure should be disposed of and time given for this purpose.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the request of the Senator from California is a very reasonable one, and one that ought to be acceded to. I think at this stage of the session we ought not to tire each other out by useless controversy.

Mr. SARGENT. If we meet at ten on Monday I am perfectly willing to say the vote shall be taken at one o'clock or earlier.

Mr. WEST. No agreement.

Mr. ANTHONY. If everybody will agree but the Senator from Louisiana, we can still make an arrangement.

Mr. WEST. We will try that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let us try that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest that the vote be taken at two o'clock on Monday.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana object to any arrangement?

Mr. WEST. I shall object unless you get the requisite number according to the rules to make a special order.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to make it a special order, because unfinished business is superior to a special order, and this will be left as unfinished business.

Mr. WEST. The Senate can fix the time. I do not think the Senator from California is to judge what the Senate considers important business. The Senate has been conducting its business to-day according to its own sense of propriety. Now his conjecture about its importance is proper to himself; there is no doubt about that; but the Senate must judge what is important to it. If the Senate chooses to fix the time at two o'clock on Monday, I have no objection in the world to let the Senate do it, but I shall not consent to it. I know that Senators want to be heard on this subject and heard at length.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not object to their being heard. The Senator himself has been heard at length, and I did not object.

Mr. MORRILL. I would like to occupy twenty or thirty minutes, but I do not want to do it to-night.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senate is aware that there is an important matter before us in executive session, and I should like to have a short executive session without displacing this bill, say for half an hour, in order to consider it.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not want to prevent that, but I want this matter to go on.

Mr. ANTHONY. When the Senate comes out of executive session this bill will be before the Senate the same as now. I move, therefore, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SARGENT. I trust that will be defeated as the other motion was.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it my duty to make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield the floor to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Georgia did yield the floor to me for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask the Senator from Georgia if he will yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NORWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLAN. I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 129) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to take from the Calendar the bill which he has named.

Mr. SARGENT. I object.

Mr. McMILLAN. I hope the Senator from California will permit this bill to come up now. It probably will not lead to any discussion.

Mr. ALLISON and others. O, yes, it will.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think it would be a very proper act to close the week with by passing the bill. There are two reports, and I think if the reports were read there would be no objection. I certainly shall ask the Senate to take a vote without any discussion, if they are willing to do so.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill cannot be passed this session unless it continues longer than Monday or Tuesday, because I have laws to read that will take that long.

Mr. McMILLAN. Well, I move to take up the bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. I call for the regular order.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think I have the floor. The Senator from Georgia yielded to me.

Mr. PADDOCK. Any Senator can call for the regular order.

Mr. McMILLAN. But I am on the floor. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins, postponing the present order for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California objects.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senator from Minnesota makes a motion to postpone the present and all prior orders.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator moves to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of considering the bill named.

Mr. INGALLS. That motion is not in order.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Georgia yielded the floor to me for the purpose of making this motion, and I have now submitted the motion and ask a vote upon it.

The PRESIDEET pro tempore. Does the Senator couple his motion to postpone with the taking up of a bill? If objection is made that is not in order.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator from Minnesota not to embarrass the progress of the bill under consideration.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not desire to do so.

Mr. SARGENT. I appeal to the Senator not to embarrass the bill that is under consideration.

Mr. McMILLAN. I had no idea it would embarrass the bill. Gentlemen did not seem ready to proceed.

Mr. McCREERY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have not yielded the floor yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota is on the floor.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is my motion in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not to postpone and take up. The Senator can move to postpone.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then I move to postpone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves to postpone the present bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the friends of the bill under consideration to resist the attempt to lay it aside. I appeal to the considerations I have heretofore urged. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate uselessly, but I make the appeal to the friends of the bill to stand by me in the position which it seems to me this legislation holds and with some regard to the considerations I have heretofore urged.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from California yield to me a moment?

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator from California will consent that this bill be taken subject to the regular order.

Mr. SARGENT. I cannot consent at all. Every possible means has been used to get me off the floor by moving the consideration of this bill, by motions to adjourn, by motions for an executive session, by taking up this and that bill. I see no way except to stand still objecting, and I do object and appeal to the friends of this legislation to stand by me in that course.

Mr. McMILLAN. As the Senator desires to proceed with the regular order, if it can be done, I shall withdraw the motion I made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NORWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANSOM. I desire to make a very small motion, Mr. President, that I trust will meet with the approbation of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions. I desire to ask the Senate to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the relief of John Wood, of North Carolina, was indefinitely postponed so that it may be put upon the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can that be done pending the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot.

Mr. RANSOM. I will ask to enter that motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That cannot be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANSOM. I will ask unanimous consent to enter it, not to interrupt the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and unanimous consent is given.

Mr. McCREERY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NORWOOD. Mr. President, at twenty minutes past ten o'clock I announced that my hour for seeking repose in sleep had arrived. It is now a quarter to eleven. I appeal to the Senator from California in charge of the bill to allow the Senate to adjourn. He knows that I have stuck to him closer than a brother during all the day, and I propose to stick to him to the last; but I advise him and the Senate that if they have eyes to close they can prepare to close them now. [Laughter.] There is but an hour and a quarter left before the Sabbath. I shall certainly occupy all of that time and much more; and when the Sabbath comes the remainder of my remarks

> Perhaps may turn out a sang,
> Perhaps turn out a sermon.

We shall certainly be here until one or two or three o'clock, and I suggest to my friend from California that he had better prepare his bed.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] suggests that he would like me to get through with that part of my speech which relates to the adjournment. I say to him that I am speaking to the question of adjournment every moment. I desire an adjournment. I do not desire anything else but an adjournment, and I am ready now to yield the floor to any member of the Senate who desires to move to adjourn. Where is the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. McCREERY?] [Laughter.] I will yield the floor for a motion to go into executive session. Where is the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY?] [Laughter.] Will the Senator move to go into executive session?

Mr. ANTHONY. My motions have had so bad a fate lately that I think I shall hardly renew them. I should like very much to have an executive session.

Mr. NORWOOD. Then, Mr. President, no one being ready to move to adjourn, I will proceed.

Is there any benefit that can accrue to this Government from the passage of this bill? The benefit can only be one of two kinds. It must be either in our foreign relations or it must be in our domestic economy. In one of these two ways we must be benefited, or the bill under consideration should not be passed.

First, let us inquire whether we shall be benefited in our relations to other governments.

It is supposed by the Senator from California that the possession of these islands is necessary in order to protect this vast domain and to prevent the subjugation of forty-five million people by some foreign foe that may invade us at some unknown time when we may not be prepared for our own defense. Those islands lie west of California, half way to China. They are as far from California almost as London is from New York; and yet it is insisted by the Senator from California that those islands are necessary to the Government of the United States as a military outpost, as a place for naval armament, as a point d'appui for the protection and the defense of the Government of the United States.

This is the main consideration that is urged for the acquisition of those islands.

The argument that the United States Government is dependent upon those islands for their defense is the strongest evidence of the weakness of the case, and it is evidence further that there is something more in this bill than the general good of the people of the United States. Of that I shall have more to say hereafter.

I say the suggestion that it is necessary to have those islands for our defense is hardly worthy of consideration; and but for the distinguished Senator, who has urged it with so much earnestness, I should not refer to it at all. The idea that 45,000,000 people who are segregated and insulated upon a continent, with the territory that we possess, with the resources that are at our command, with a railroad from ocean to ocean which can be traversed within five days, not being capable of defending themselves or protecting themselves against any force that any power on the earth, or that all the powers of the earth might bring against us, is not to be entertained for a moment.

But, again, it is said that we need those islands for our commercial interests. That is not true. We have a treaty existing with the King of the Hawaiian Islands, or the Sandwich Islands, by which we have a lodgment upon those shores that is sufficient for commerce so long as peace exists, and it is not necessary that this treaty shall go into effect in order that we may enjoy the advantages which are necessary in time of peace. In a time of war we do not need them for defense; we can take care of ourselves.

Mr. WEST. I ask the Senator from Georgia to yield to me.

Mr. NORWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. I desire to say that in making the motion that I did some time ago to adjourn, I submitted it at a time when I thought it was reasonable for the Senate to cease its labors for the day. Finding, however, that that was not the disposition the proceedings have been continued. Now, I have to propose to the Senator who is so much interested in this bill, the Senator from California, that if the Senate adjourns at this time those who are opposed to the bill will resort to no parliamentary tactics or efforts to talk the bill out of time on Monday when it comes up in the regular order.

Mr. SARGENT. I certainly will accept that. I think it is frank and fair. I am willing to accept it, and rely upon the sense of good faith of Senators generally to carry it out as stated. I think that proposition will be acceptable.

Mr. GORDON. I simply desire that this matter shall be thoroughly understood. Of course it is not understood by the Senator from California, for we have had a conversation about it, nor must it be understood by the Senate, that there is any promise that no remarks will be made upon the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Not at all.

Mr. GORDON. I desire myself to be heard upon the question.

Mr. SARGENT. Unquestionably; I think that is the right of Senators.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is not present, who has charge of the constitutional amendment, which I know he intends to press.

Mr. SARGENT. Nevertheless the Hawaiian bill is the unfinished business.

Mr. WEST. There is no doubt but that there is a majority of the Senate in favor of this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. What bill?

Mr. WEST. The Hawaiian treaty bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Let us pass it now, then.

Mr. WEST. You have no quorum to pass it, and you cannot keep us here till daylight to pass it. Therefore I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LOGAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana.

The motion was agreed to; and (at eleven o'clock and eleven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 12, 1876.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate receded from their disagreement to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 846) to punish the counterfeiting of trade-mark goods and the sale or dealing in of counterfeit trade-mark goods.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 3962) to provide means to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia until December 1, 1876, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as managers of the conference on the part of the Senate Mr. WINDOM, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. KERNAN.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3473) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; and further insisted upon its amendments, and requested a further conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate Mr. WINDOM, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. KERNAN.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 3628) establishing post-roads.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendments, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1089) granting a pension to Thomas I. Fox, late a private of Company C, Fifty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1713) for the relief of Berthold Loewenthal, of Chicago, Illinois;

A bill (H. R. No. 2271) to increase the pension of Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner;

A bill (H. R. No. 3209) to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to receive lands in payment of judgments to eastern band of Cherokee Indians;

A bill (H. R. No. 3374) for the relief of Harry E. Eastman, late lieutenant-colonel Second Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 3678) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Lydia to that of Sylph; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3849) for the relief of James W. Harvey and James Livesey, of the firm of Harvey & Livesey, of Wisconsin.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 492) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house and fog-bell on Whale Rock, at the entrance of Narraganset Bay;

A bill (S. No. 832) to increase the pension of Helen M. Stansbury; and

A bill (S. No. 951) to remove the political disabilities of Stephen D. Lee, of the State of Mississippi, and others.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In pursuance of the order of the House, made on yesterday, the Chair will appoint as additional members of the Committee on Enrolled Bills Mr. POPPLETON of Ohio, and Mr. BAKER of Indiana.

PUBLICATION OF COAST SURVEY REPORTS.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back, with a recommendation that the same be adopted, a concurrent resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That 1,000 extra copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year ending June 30, 1874, and the same number of copies of his report for the year ending June 30, 1875, be printed, to be distributed by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

Mr. SINGLETON. That resolution was originally introduced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD,] a member of the Committee on Commerce of this House. It received the approval of that committee, who recommended its passage, and it was referred to the Committee on Printing. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to ask that it now be acted upon by the House.

The concurrent resolution was then agreed to.

EXPENSES OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the House on yesterday asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3962) to provide means to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia until December 1, 1876.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered upon the Journal.

EXPENSES OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Printing Senate bill No. 1035, to provide for paying the expenses of the Joint Committee on Printing in making an inquiry in relation to the public printing.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 984) to provide for the sale of certain lands in Kansas.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SINGLETON. I submit the report which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 16, 51, 77, 82, 87, 91, 94, 98, 105, 107, and 108.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 60, 61, 62, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 78, 79, 81, 83, 84, 85, 86, 88, 90, 92, 93, 95, 96, 97, 100, 101, 103, 104, 111, 113, 115, 116, 117, 119, and 121.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 14 and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out of said amendment "Portugal, Switzerland, Greece, Denmark, Ecuador, Colombia, and Bolivia," and strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty-two," and strike out "five thousand" and insert "five hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 18, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Add as a new paragraph:

"For salaries of chargés d'affaires to Denmark, Greece, Switzerland, Portugal, and Paraguay and Uruguay, at $5,000 each, $25,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 24, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 41, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out of said amendment "Swatow;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 58 and 59, and agree to the paragraph where the amendments occur, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said paragraph insert the following:

"Cork, Dublin, Prescott, Port Sarnia, St. Johns, (Canada East,) Barbadoes, Fort Erie, Leeds, Dundee, Leith, Toronto, Hamilton, Halifax, St. Johns, (New Brunswick,) Kingston, (Jamaica,) Nassau, (New Providence,) Cardiff, Port Louis, (Mauritius,) Bermuda, Quebec."

And the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 63, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "Vlandivostock;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 74, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "Goderich, Windsor, (Canada,) Malta," and restore "Windsor, (Nova Scotia);" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 75, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "Nantes and La Rochelle;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 76, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "Port Mahon and Valencia;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 80, and agree to the same with amendment as follows: Strike out "Santa Cruz;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 89, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "Maranham;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 99, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out of said amendment "51,000" and insert "42,600;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 102, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "6" and insert "5;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 106, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "and thirty-one thousand and eight" and insert "fifteen thousand," and strike out "hundred and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 109, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "700" and insert "1,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 110, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "9" and insert "2;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 112, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "4" and insert "2;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 114, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "10" and insert "9;" and in line 2, page 9 of the bill, strike out "thousand" and insert "five hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 118, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "two thousand six" and insert "three thousand one;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 120, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 122, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph:

"For compensation of such diplomatic and consular officers heretofore compensated by salaries for whose salaries no appropriation is made by this act, such amount as shall be necessary to pay their salaries as fixed by law until they shall have notice to close their offices, which notice shall be at once sent to them by the Secretary of State, and for the time allowed by law for transit from their respective posts to their places of residence, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

And the Senate agree to the same.

O. R. SINGLETON,
W. S. HOLMAN,
CHARLES FOSTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

A. A. SARGENT,
GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
T. M. NORWOOD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that this is the fourth committee of conference on this bill. We have had a great many difficulties to encounter in coming to a proper understanding and agreement. The principle upon which we have settled this question is that we divide the money difference between the Senate and the House, giving to the Senate conferees, after consultation with the Secretary of State, the privilege of continuing salaries as fixed by law, but withdrawing both from the diplomatic and consular service such ministers and such consuls as were deemed to be least important for our foreign relations. In carrying out that agreement upon the diplomatic part of the bill, Portugal, Switzerland, Bolivia, Ecuador, Colombia, Paraguay and Uruguay, Greece, and Denmark have been left out from the list of ministers resident. They are to be withdrawn entirely; and I repeat again, that has been done, after consultation on the part of the Senate conferees with the Secretary of State, as being the least likely to cripple our foreign service.

We have deducted from contingent expenses $25,000 and from chargés d'affaires $20,250. And then in place of ministers we have sent chargés to Portugal, Switzerland, Greece, Denmark, and Paraguay and Uruguay. This makes $82,750 saved upon the diplomatic part of the bill, being one-half of the difference between the two Houses.

So far as the consular service is concerned we have left out consuls at certain ports, as follows: Swatow, Southampton, Valdivostock, Malta, Oporto, Santa Cruz, Port Said, Nantes, La Rochelle, Port Mahon, Valencia, Stettin, Maranham, Cyprus, Bucharest, Venice, Milan, Gaboon, Turk's Island, Hakodadi, Goderich and Windsor, (Canada,) making twenty-two. We have reduced the allowance to consular clerks $8,000 and to interpreters $1,500. We have taken from the amount appropriated for the difference in exchange bills drawn by our foreign ministers $38,000, from contingent expenses $16,850, from the Spanish claims commission $500, from counsel for commission $500, from rent of prisons $2,000, and from wages of keepers, &c., $500.

We have deducted from the allowance for care of American seamen $25,000, leaving $75,000 still to be expended for that purpose, whereas last year it only cost sixty-three thousand some hundred dollars. The amount is deemed to be amply sufficient.

In the consular service there has been saved to the country $125,318. The whole amount which has been saved on the appropriation of last year is $208,068.

We have not obtained all that we should like to have done. We believed the reductions might have been carried further, but we have done the best we could under the circumstances, and we think it will be satisfactory to the country. If any gentleman desires to ask a question, I will yield him the floor for that purpose.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to ask the gentleman to inform me in regard to the status of the consulate at Windsor, Canada West, and also of the consulate at Sarnia.

Mr. SINGLETON. Windsor has been stricken out.

Mr. CONGER. But what about Sarnia?

Mr. SINGLETON. That has not been stricken out.

Mr. CONGER. Is there any provision made for a consulate at Windsor?

Mr. SINGLETON. No, sir; none at all.

Mr. CONGER. Windsor, Canada West, is one of the largest ports of entry on the lakes, Detroit being opposite to it. There is a large emigration going there which needs the services of a consul. It is more important, except Port Huron, than any other place on the lake.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will state to the gentleman that under our bill Windsor was not stricken out, but his friends and the Secretary of State have brought about this result, for which we are not at all responsible.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman says Secretary of State. I ask if the Secretary did not consent merely to state what particular places ought to be left out with the least damage to the service?

Mr. SINGLETON. That is exactly what I have stated to the House.

Mr. CONGER. The Secretary of State, therefore, under that compulsion, has agreed to the omission of Windsor, Canada West?

Mr. SINGLETON. That is what I stated to the House, and I will repeat it, that by our bill Windsor was retained. This has been done in conference committee, under the advice of the Secretary of State, believing it would result in less damage to our service to remove the consul at Windsor, Canada West, than a consul at some other place which has been retained.

Now one word in reference to the last clause of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to ask the gentleman whether he will give an opportunity for some remarks?

Mr. SINGLETON. I will certainly do so. We have provided in the last section of the bill for paying the salaries of those who are abroad now and who are to be withdrawn up to the time when they shall receive the notice of their discharge. This is only right and proper. It will take on the average nearly a month to give them that notice, and therefore, they will be entitled to receive pay up to the time notice is given to shut up their offices. In addition, we propose to pay their expenses home as the law authorizes. For this purpose $25,000 is set apart, or so much as may be necessary. It was not deemed proper nor just to leave them in a foreign land dismissed from the service without any fault of their own, with perhaps not means sufficient to get home.

Mr. MONROE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Mississippi one question. Perhaps I should have been sufficiently informed upon the point if I had heard every word that he said. I wish to ask what change, if any, has been made in the salaries of consuls of the rank of consul of the consulate at Rio?

Mr. SINGLETON. There has been no change made at all in the salaries of consuls or of ministers. They are allowed to stand as they were before. The reduction has been in the contingent expenses and in withdrawing certain ministers and consuls.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. In agreeing to this conference report, Mr. Speaker, I have not found my judgment in accord with the report. I have agreed to it because we wanted to come to some agreement. No law has been repealed; no salary has been reduced. The reduction accomplished has been by the withdrawal of service, by the withdrawal of diplomats in the diplomatic service, and by the withdrawal of consuls in the consular service. This was done after a conference with the Secretary of State and his assistants, they stating to us that the withdrawals they suggested were the ones that would do the least harm. They did not concede that these withdrawals could be made without doing some harm to the service. I have felt, Mr. Speaker, that it was our duty, if possible, to come to an agreement, and for the purpose of coming to an agreement I have assented to this report, feeling it was the best we could obtain. I have not felt we have been doing right by the service, particularly so far as the consulates are concerned. I have always felt that the tax we impose upon the commerce of the country should be paid back for the benefit of the commerce we tax, and that when we use the money that we are paid from this tax for other purposes we violate a trust.

Mr. RANDALL. These reductions, as I understand them, are rather against the occupant of the diplomatic consular places than the service itself.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. Having heard only the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi of the number of consuls and the places from which they are withdrawn, I cannot refer to the importance of several of them as I should like to do. I desire to say, however, that some of those which I heard mentioned are in remote parts of the world, where the consul, aside from any duties he may have in regard to the commerce and commercial interests of the United States, is the only representative of this Government to take charge of our sailors in large regions of the distant parts of the world. Now we tax the sailors of the United States enough, at the rate of forty cents a month, to furnish them with some officer into whatever part of the world they may go, to settle their differences and to provide for their return home when they are shipwrecked, or when they are lost, or when they are left by chance behind their ships.

In hearing the names of some of these consulates that are withdrawn I am free to say that there are among them places in distant parts of the world where our ships go, where a sailor cannot find within hundreds of miles any consul to afford him the remedies which the law requires. But I pass that by. I desire to refer, as an example of the manner in which these consulates have been discontinued, to the consulate at Windsor, opposite the city of Detroit, in my own State—a consulate the fees of which are more than double the salary of the officer, and have been so for years, which with the railroads coming from Canada, and through Canada from New York, from Buffalo, and the suspension bridge into the United States is absolutely necessary to the commercial business of Michigan, of Chicago, of Cincinnati, and all those places that require a consular certificate to the consignments and invoices of goods. Here is a consulate at a salary of $1,500 removed from a point one of the most important on all the lake, and where the fees more than double, I think more than treble, every year the salary of the consul.

What shall those men do? The law requires a certificate of every entry and every invoice. What shall the emigrants do coming from Canada, as they come to the number of five or six thousand a year to that point? Shall they send to Niagara? Shall they send to Toronto? For they must have consular certificates before they can bring their goods into the United States. What is the economy which shall destroy a consulate upon one of the great highways of emigration to this country? What kind of benefit is it to the Government of the United States to destroy a consulate which furnishes in fees, I will venture to say, more than treble the salary of the consul?

And if this be so in a case within my own knowledge, how may it be in other cases? And what can be the economy of discontinuing these consulates? We make large charges on emigrants and consignors of goods for the certificate of the consul; and from Canada many of the goods that come by the Saint Lawrence to Chicago, to Saint Louis, to Cincinnati, to Milwaukee, to Detroit, to almost all our western and northwestern cities, come by way of Detroit and by way of Port Huron, entered under the consular certificate, and passed in bond in transportation to these cities, and the duties assessed and paid when they arrive at their destination.

Now you have removed the only means by which these consular certificates which must be given at the last port of departure, which is Windsor in this case. You propose to legislate out of office the only officer who can give his certificate of at least one-half of the importations that come by the way of the Saint Lawrence to all of the cities of the West and of the Northwest, and I here speak of this so that gentlemen may remember when they hear complaints from merchants and emigrants, from the press and the people, they will remember that I have protested and do protest against any reduction of consulates that are so very necessary, and with this reduction, if there were no other objections to the bill as proposed to be enacted by the conference committee I should feel compelled from a sense of duty to oppose the report of the committee, and to vote against it, and to prevent its passage as far as it may be in my power.

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman must remember that the House struck out forty-one consulates, and that the report of the committee of conference only strikes out eighteen, it being a compromise report.

Mr. HOAR. Did not the Secretary of State say that the omission of these consulates would be a great public calamity or would prove a source of public calamity?

Mr. SINGLETON. That is exactly what I stated.

Mr. HOAR. O, I think not. I think the gentleman said that it was at the instance of the Secretary of State that this consulate was omitted.

Mr. SINGLETON. If there is a need for a consular agent there at present with fees, all the President has to do is to appoint him.

Mr. CONGER. But a consular agent cannot give these certificates.

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not see why he cannot.

Mr. CONGER. The law does not permit.

Mr. SINGLETON. I call for the previous question on the report of the committee of conference.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPROPRIATION FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which a conference was agreed to on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3962) providing means to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia until December 1, 1876. I am compelled to do it now, because I am apprised that the conference committee is in session.

Mr. BANKS. The motion cannot be acted upon until the papers are in the possession of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make a statement in reference to this matter.

Mr. BANKS. I made the statement which I have made as a question of order.

Mr. RANDALL. This bill was reported to the House from the Committee for the District of Columbia, and it authorized the commissioners of this District to borrow in anticipation of the revenues derived from taxation $418,000. The Senate amended the bill and made it an actual appropriation of half a million dollars for this District, changing the entire bill from what originally belonged to the Committee for the District of Columbia to an appropriation which belongs to the Committee on Appropriations. During my absence from the House the bill was taken up and the amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in without explanation or discussion. I believe a conference committee has been appointed, and I would not have known of it had not my attention been called to it by the vigilant gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. What I want to get at is this, that the subject having been thoroughly considered during this session of Congress by the Committee on Appropriations in connection with the appropriations for the District of Columbia, that committee shall have charge of it and the right to consider the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the papers are all in possession of the House at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, the papers are in the possession of the House, and not in the committee of conference, strangely enough.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the Clerk to read the amendments of the Senate.

The Clerk read the amendments of the Senate, as follows:

That the sum of $500,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia as the share of the United States toward the expenses of said District for the year beginning July 1, 1876.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act making an appropriation to aid in defraying the expenses of the District of Columbia."

Mr. REAGAN. Is this a bill to pay the interest on the debt of the District of Columbia?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir. The bill as sent over to the Senate, which was reported by the District Committee of this House, authorized the commissioners of the District of Columbia to anticipate by a temporary loan a little over $400,000 of the revenues to be derived from taxation, because Congress had failed to fix the rate of taxation in time, so that they might have money enough to run the government of the District of Columbia between now and December next. They had I believe $250,000 in the treasury, and this would give them $640,000. I may not be quite correct in my figures, but that is about the amount. That will cover the expenses of the District government between now and next December.

Now, the amendment of the Senate to the bill is a clear, naked appropriation out of the Treasury, which this House has refused to make, and which I do not think the House understood intelligibly at the time they non-concurred and appointed a committee of conference.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman think it wise for us to increase the debt of the District of Columbia so long as we admit that there is some liability on the part of the United States to pay its share of the expenses of the District government?

Mr. RANDALL. I believe the District government can run for the sum provided for by the House bill; but in no event am I in favor of giving half a million dollars out of the Treasury of the Government for the benefit of this District.

Mr. KASSON. I am not familiar with all the details, but I am familiar with the difference of principle between the two bills. The one bill authorizes a loan, which must be paid by somebody.

Mr. RANDALL. By the people of the District.

Mr. KASSON. Subject, of course, to the appropriation which the Congress may make hereafter as its share of the expenses of the District government.

Mr. RANDALL. Not at all.

Mr. KASSON. Let me finish my sentence. The bill as it comes from the Senate substitutes two things: first, a direct appropriation in lieu of a loan, and second a declaration that that appropriation is the share of the United States in the expenses of the District. I believe that is all the difference between the two bills.

Mr. RANDALL. The House bill authorized the commissioners of the District to anticipate the revenues from taxation. The Senate bill gives them all those revenues, and appropriates a half a million more out of the public Treasury of the United States.

Mr. KASSON. But I believe I am not mistaken when I say that it has never been claimed that the entire expenses of the government of this District shall be paid by taxes levied on the people of the District.

Mr. RANDALL. This bill——

Mr. KASSON. One moment. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me till I have completed my statement.

Mr. RANDALL. I am entitled to the floor, and you hold it from me.

Mr. KASSON. Certainly, by your courtesy. We have always admitted that the United States is liable to pay a proportion of the expenses of the District government. The gentleman himself has never denied that. The only objection that can be taken to the bill as it comes from the Senate is that it now fixes that proportion at the sum appropriated. The bill as it went from the House left that proportion to be fixed hereafter, and requires the expenses of the District to be paid out of the taxes, which cannot now be realized, and authorizes the District commissioners to make a loan in anticipation. I do not ask the gentleman to do anything about this one way or the other, but only that the House shall understand what the bill is.

Mr. RANDALL. I only want to state a fact. There is no danger in the world that the District will not get money enough out of the Treasury. Year before last the appropriations for the District were nearly $3,000,000, and last year they were very large; I do not remember the exact amount.

Mr. FOSTER. They were a little over a million of dollars last year, I think.

Mr. RANDALL. That is, we appropriated about $4,000,000 in two years. Now I say there is no danger but what the District will get its share out of the United States Treasury, its adequate and equitable share. I now call the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. So far as the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is concerned I do not propose to say a word. I understand that this bill as it comes from the Senate makes an appropriation of $500,000, while the bill of the House appropriated something over $400,000.

Mr. RANDALL. No; the bill as it comes from the Senate is a clean cut out of the Treasury of half a million of dollars, while the House bill merely authorized the District commissioners by a loan to anticipate the revenues from taxation by some $400,000. I now insist upon the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, upon a division, ayes 113, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to reconsider the vote by which the House on yesterday disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 3962) to provide means to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia until December 1, 1876, and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WILLARD. I have just come into the House and did not know that this subject was to be called up.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not know when it was called up yesterday.

Mr. WILLARD. This bill originally came from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late now for any further discussion except by unanimous consent, the main question having been ordered.

Mr. WILLARD. I hope the motion to reconsider will be voted down.

Mr. RANDALL. We will see whether it will be voted down or not.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider; and upon a division there were—ayes 104, noes 24.

Mr. PAGE. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a further count demanded?

Mr. KASSON. I hope no further count will be demanded.

Mr. PAGE. I withdraw the point that no quorum voted.

No further count being asked, the motion to reconsider was declared to be carried.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move that the bill, with the Senate amendments thereto, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KASSON. I ask consent that the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WILLARD,] the chairman of the House committee of conference on this bill and a member of the Committee for the District of Columbia from which the bill was originally reported, be allowed to make a statement before the vote is taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That requires unanimous consent, the previous question now operating.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection.

There being no objection, leave was accordingly granted.

Mr. WILLARD. I desire simply to say, in the first place, that this bill was originally reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia, and provided that the commissioners of the District might anticipate by a loan, to be paid out of the revenues to be derived by the taxes assessed under the tax bill passed by this Congress, the amount necessary to pay the expenses of the government of this District until December 1, 1876.

The bill having passed the House went to the Senate, and was sent back to us with a Senate amendment. As a matter of course, I as well as the other members of the Committee for the District of Columbia supposed that the bill properly belonged to our committee, and I therefore asked unanimous consent last evening to have the bill taken from the Speaker's table so that a conference might be had on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. The conference committee has been appointed on the part of the House and also on the part of the Senate, and just now, while this conference committee was in session, I learned that there was an effort made in the House to take the bill from that conference committee and refer it to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. I made that motion, and the gentleman knows it. He went to the Clerk's desk and found out the fact.

Mr. WILLARD. I knew that the motion was entered, but I did not suppose that it was to be acted on. Furthermore, I wish to raise this point of order——

Mr. RANDALL. Too late.

Mr. WILLARD. I raise the point of order that the bill was properly in the possession of the Senate, not of the House, as the Senate was the body that agreed to the conference. The bill, as I supposed, belonged properly to the Senate; and I expected that it would be found there. When the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate sought to find the bill which he supposed was on the table of the President pro tempore, he found it had been sent over to this House improperly.

Mr. RANDALL. It came over here properly; and in the haste——

Mr. HOAR. I call the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to order.

Mr. WILLARD. I hope that under these circumstances the House will not send this bill to the Committee on Appropriations, where it does not properly belong.

Mr. RANDALL. This bill originated, as the gentleman states, in the Committee for the District of Columbia; but he will remember distinctly that he was in conference with the Committee on Appropriations as to the manner in which this allowance should be made to the District, and that the Committee on Appropriations only gave their assent to it in the form in which it was originally passed. He will further remember that yesterday afternoon, before he made his motion to take the bill from the Speaker's table, he was in conference with me, and that I did not assent to his proposition at all.

Mr. WILLARD. I did not understand that the gentleman dissented from the proposition to have the bill go to a conference committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I told the gentleman in that conversation that we could not give any more money to the District; did I not?

Mr. WILLARD. I did not suppose there was any objection to having the bill go to a conference committee.

Mr. RANDALL. The whole character of the bill has been changed; it is now made an appropriation bill and embraces an entire plan of appropriations for the District.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. RANDALL to refer the bill to the Committee on Appropriations, there were—ayes 107, noes 45.

Mr. WILLARD called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. WILLARD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 45.

So the motion of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RE-IMBURSEMENT OF BALTIMORE MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Private Calendar and passed the bill (H. R. No. 2690) to refund to the mayor and city council of Baltimore certain moneys illegally assessed and collected for internal-revenue tax.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

JOHN J. ANDERSON.

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Private Calendar for consideration now the bill (S. No. 628) for the relief of John J. Anderson, surviving copartner of the firm of Anderson & White.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. STONE. I ask the House to indulge me a moment while I make a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

INVESTIGATION OF SOLDIERS' HOMES.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That $2,500 may be drawn from the contingent fund of the House on the order of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to pay the necessary expenses of the investigation of the volunteer soldiers' homes ordered by the House.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution adopted by the House yesterday failed to include a provision for paying the expenses of this investigation.

Mr. STONE. If this resolution requires unanimous consent, I object.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I did not object to the gentleman's request for unanimous consent.

STOCKBRIDGE AND MUNSEE INDIANS.

Mr. CATE. I ask unanimous consent to have taken up and put on its passage now a bill reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 4086) for the relief of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribes of Indians in the State of Wisconsin."

Mr. STONE. I object.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the message from the Senate in regard to the action of that body on the Indian appropriation bill be read. The Senate has non-concurred in the report of the conference committee on that bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
August 11, 1876.

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and ask a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. WINDOM, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. KERNAN be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to state that there is but a single difficulty about this bill, and that is not of much importance. If a new committee be appointed a conclusion will be reached almost immediately. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendments and agree to the further conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. RANDALL, Mr. SCALES, and Mr. HURLBUT as conferees on the part of the House.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HEREFORD, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print in the RECORD as part of the debates some remarks which he had prepared on the subject of the extravagance and corruption of the administration. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SPENCER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print in the RECORD as part of the debates some remarks which he had prepared on the condition of the country. [See Appendix.]

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order of business has been demanded, and the House now resumes the consideration of the motion made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] on Thursday last to reconsider the vote by which the message of the President of the United States accompanying the sundry civil appropriation bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LYNCH] is entitled to the floor for thirty minutes, the remaining portion of the hour of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

Mr. FORT. I rise to make a report from the Committee of Accounts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is a motion to reconsider and is privileged, and a report from the Committee of Accounts is not of higher privilege so as to supersede it.

Mr. LYNCH. On Saturday last I asked the House to allow me an extension of time beyond the thirty minutes so kindly yielded to me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but objection was made by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND.] I understand that he does not now insist on his objection. I therefore ask unanimous consent of the House that my time shall be extended thirty minutes, so I may occupy the floor for one hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the time of the gentleman is extended for thirty minutes.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful to the House for its courtesy in allowing me to occupy the floor for an hour. It is not my purpose to reply to the speech which was made by my colleague from the fifth district, [Mr. HOOKER,] but to reply to some of the points which were so ably and so eloquently presented by my colleague from the first district, [Mr. LAMAR.] It is not my purpose, however, to refer to the first part of his speech, as I have no disposition or inclination to discuss the theory of our Government, the constitutional limitations of power, the propriety or impropriety of Federal interference in the domestic affairs of a State. I shall endeavor to confine myself to what I believe to be the living issues of to-day—those which are now agitating the public mind.

Now, sir, the political status of the colored race of this country is in some respects an unfortunate one. In my humble judgment it is unfortunate that the status of that race is necessarily made the subject of political discussion. I had hoped that after the last three amendments to the Constitution had been ratified, and the colored people invested with all of their rights, civil and political, so far as constitutional declarations and statutory enactments could fix them, that all political parties would acquiesce in these results to such an extent as to remove from the politics of the country this race question. I had hoped that the elevation, the advancement, and the protection of this race would be the aim, the object, and the aspiration of all political parties. This race issue will not be removed from the politics of the country, in my judgment, until that is done, and that it should be done I believe every honest man must admit.

Before proceeding to answer the points which were so forcibly made by my colleague from the first district, I hope I will be pardoned for digressing a little, for the purpose of explaining to the House and the country why it is that the colored people in the State of Mississippi are in favor of general amnesty. I have been desirous of making a remark or two on this point ever since the amnesty debates of last winter, but have not had an opportunity to do so. As this question has a direct bearing on the southern situation, I presume it will not be inappropriate for me to do so now.

After the passage of the reconstruction acts by Congress conferring upon the colored people the right to vote, we found ourselves in a very peculiar position. The voting population of the South was composed of three distinct elements: the ex-confederate soldiers and those who sympathized with them, the ex-Federal soldiers who had concluded to locate at the South, and the colored race. These elements have been, and were at that time, politically antagonistic to each other. The colored men could not be expected to identify themselves with any other than the republican party, and yet they could not fail to see and realize the fact that that party, to have a permanent existence and a firm and solid foundation, must include in its membership a large percentage of the wealth and the intelligence of the State, some of those who fought on the side of the confederacy.

How to bring the republican party into existence in that State upon such a basis as would render possible a harmonious union of these conflicting elements and at the same time be in harmony with the great republican party of the Union, was the task we had before us. To make this union possible, the colored men very generously and magnanimously, traits for which I presume all will admit they are particularly characterized, declared in language which could not be misunderstood that if those who had fought and upheld the "lost cause" would renounce all allegiance to that cause, announce it as their determination to stand by and defend the Union, and concede to the colored men every right and privilege they claimed for themselves—in other words, identify themselves with the great republican party—if they would do this, that they, the colored men, would support them just as heartily, just as earnestly, and just as enthusiastically as they would support those who fought for the cause of the Union; and to give emphasis to this declaration they were willing to incorporate in the platform of the republican party of that State, and did incorporate, a plank pledging the party to this doctrine of equal rights for every man and amnesty for the late rebels.

This was done. Upon this platform the republican party of Mississippi was brought into existence; and I stand upon the floor of the House of Representatives to-day for the purpose of declaring what I know to be true, that this party as thus organized, including in its membership as it does not less than nineteen-twentieths of the colored men of the South; including in its membership as it does not less than nineteen-twentieths of the ex-Federal soldiers in the State; including in its membership as it does not less than one-fifth and possibly more of the ex-confederate soldiers in the State; this party as thus organized includes in its membership a majority of not less than thirty thousand of the qualified voters of that State. It was so strong, so powerful, so overwhelming in numbers that nothing short of organized terrorism and armed violence, such as was unfortunately resorted to by the democratic party of that State last year, could crush it out of existence or defeat it at the polls.

I may be pardoned, Mr. Speaker, for remarking here that the white men who are identified with the republican party of the State of Mississippi, not northern men merely but southern men, ex-confederates, represent a large percentage of the wealth, the intelligence, and the moral worth of the white people of that State. They are as a class men who would be accepted in any community as high-toned, honest, honorable citizens and valuable members of society. They are as a class men whom the democracy in former days delighted to honor with the highest positions in the gift of the people of the State. They are admitted to be men of character, men of ability, men of standing and of unquestionable reputation. None of my democratic colleagues, I venture to assert, will deny this; for they know it to be true. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, this is why we have placed ourselves upon this broad, liberal, and conservative platform in addition to the fact that the colored people are particularly desirous of showing to their white brethren that they have no disposition to oppress them or deprive them of a single right they claim for themselves.

I will now refer to some of the points made by my honorable colleague. In giving his reasons for the present unfortunate condition of affairs at the South, there was one remark made by him that touched my sensitive feeling. And that was the comparison, apparently at least, of the colored people with the Mongolian race, that has been imported from China to America. It is certainly known by southern as well as northern men that the colored people of this country are thoroughly American; born and raised upon American soil and under the influence of American institutions; not American citizens by adoption, but by birth; worshiping the same God that the white men worship; identified with the same religious denominations that the white race is identified with; imbued with every sentiment of love of country, devotion to the Constitution, and loyalty to the flag that the white race is imbued with; identified in every conceivable particular with American institutions and with American liberty. For my honorable colleague, unwittingly as I believe, to compare this race with the untutored, the uncivilized, the unchristianized, and the un-Americanized Mongolian, that has been imported from China to America, was unjust, ungenerous, and unfair. I do not wish to be understood as detracting any thing from that great and powerful race, but it is known that they are not American; and that cannot be said of the colored race, for they are.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Now, sir, let me say something with regard to the policy of reconstruction. It will be remembered by those who heard the speech of my colleague that he made the remark that the reconstruction policy of the Government was the foundation of all of the political evils at the South; that that was the foundation of the color-line in politics, because the reconstruction policy of the Government enfranchised the colored men and disfranchised the white men; and that therefore there was a gulf between the two races, and that was the cause of the race struggles of the South and all the evils of which we complain. Before answering that argument let us see what are the logical deductions to be drawn from it. If it be true, as he asserted, that the enfranchisement of the colored men at the South was the cause of all of our troubles there, it seems to me that we can draw no other deduction from that argument (if there is anything in it) than that the only effectual remedy is to remove the cause; that you cannot remove it unless you disfranchise them and remand them back to their former condition. That seems to me to be the logical deduction to be drawn from the argument, though he did not say so, and I do not wish to be understood as placing him in the attitude of advocating that proposition. I am merely stating what seems to me the only conclusion to be arrived at as the logical result of the argument.

Let us inquire whether there is anything in that view of the case. I take issue with my honorable colleague in that respect, and will endeavor to show by referring to my own State that he is entirely mistaken. Why, sir, my colleague seems to have forgotten that in the State of Mississippi we have never had any serious troubles between the two races since the re-admission of that State into the Union until the latter part of 1874 and during the campaign of 1875. Until then we never had any serious troubles whatever. The two races got along well together and never had any serious difficulty of any kind, the democratic party sometimes putting colored men on their own ticket. If, then, the enfranchisement of the colored men was the cause of all the troubles in the South, is it not remarkably strange that it took the democratic party from five to eight years to find it out? Is it not remarkably strange that we could get along so well together for five or eight years without finding out that the incorporation of the colored element into the body-politic was the cause of our difficulties? No, sir; I will tell you what was the cause. The democratic victories at the North in 1874 so encouraged and exasperated the lawless and turbulent elements at the South as to give them the entire control of the party machinery in the democratic party. That was the cause of it.

The democratic victories at the North so strengthened this element of lawlessness as to give them power to control the democratic organization and to shape its policy; and therefore the color line was drawn in politics, not because the colored men first drew it, as is sometimes charged, but because this element felt that they would be sustained by the public sentiment of the country in resorting to violent measures for the purpose of accomplishing what they could not accomplish by peaceful means. The incorporation of the colored element into the body-politic had nothing to do with it, because the two races had lived as peaceful, as quietly, as orderly together prior to that time as they possibly could have done. Every election held in Mississippi since the re-admission of the State was peaceable, quiet, orderly and, except possibly in one or two localities which were not general in their character, fair. We never had occasion to call on the Federal Government for Federal interference; we never had an occasion to bring up charges for violence in any election held in the State until the general election last year and in a local election the fall previous.

Is it not strange that the argument is now brought forward that what was done five or eight years ago was the foundation of the violence of last year? Why, the argument is fallacious, it is unsound, it is unreasonable, and cannot be substantiated.

DEMOCRATIC RULE IN MISSISSIPPI.

Now, sir, let us see what has been done in the State of Mississippi under this policy that has been inaugurated. It will be remembered that my honorable colleague in his very eloquent speech referred to the State of Louisiana, and in so doing he held up republican rule in that State as typical of republican rule in the other Southern States. But he did not make any allusion to Mississippi especially.

Now, then, when holding up republican rule in the State of Louisiana as typical of republican rule in other southern States, he certainly must have known that republican rule in Louisiana, as understood and explained by himself, is not typical of republican rule in Mississippi. But I presume that none of our democratic friends will object to having democratic rule in the State of Mississippi under the new order of things held up as typical of democratic government in the other Southern States.

Now let us see what it is. I cannot speak of all of it, for I have not the time to do so. As the result of the election in the State of Mississippi in November last we had a Legislature brought into existence which has characterized its proceedings by greater blunders than any that were ever complained of by any of its republican predecessors. This Legislature having been brought into existence through questionable channels—that is a mild phrase, for I have too much respect for the feelings of my colleagues to use harsh phrases in their presence—but that Legislature having been brought into existence through questionable channels, what did it do?

Among the first of its proceedings was to revolutionize the entire State government, by taking forcibly the possession of the other two departments—the executive and judicial—by turning out of office every man who stood as a stumbling-block in the way of a complete democratic ascendency in the State. Well, they say they did it in a legal and constitutional way. Let us see about that. To get control of the executive and judicial departments of the government, it was necessary for them to impeach and remove from office both the governor and lieutenant-governor, so that the democratic president of the senate could become the acting governor. The first thing then was to get rid of the lieutenant-governor. He was impeached and removed from office on a charge of bribery. He was charged with having been bribed by two eminent lawyers to pardon a convict out of the State penitentiary; a very grave offense, for which he deserved impeachment, if true. Under the laws of Mississippi a man who proposes a bribe is just as guilty as the one who accepts it.

Those two lawyers who were charged with having bribed the lieutenant-governor happened to be very eminent and able democrats. The charge was made several months before the election and several months before the assembling of the Legislature. During that time the grand jury of Lowndes County, the county in which all three of the parties resided, thoroughly we are told, investigated this matter. This grand jury, composed of a majority of democrats, made a report to the court that all the parties to the transaction were innocent. No evidence could be produced to establish the guilt of any of them. The Legislature had no jurisdiction over the two democratic lawyers, they being private citizens. But they did have jurisdiction over the lieutenant-governor, he being a civil officer of the State. They then proceeded to investigate his conduct upon the charges upon which he had been acquitted by a democratic grand jury, no other charge being preferred against him, and pronounced him guilty, and he was accordingly impeached and removed. Now I do not say he was innocent, for I do not know; I did not investigate the matter, and I am not prepared to express an opinion upon that subject. Perhaps he was guilty; it is not necessary to answer my purpose to defend him. But the point I make is that either the democratic grand jury failed to discharge its duty for the purpose of shielding the two democratic lawyers from justice or else the Legislature was guilty of persecuting an officer for political purposes; one of the two is true, and it is not very favorable to the democratic party either way.

Now, after having got rid of the lieutenant-governor, the next thing was to get rid of the governor. Charges of impeachment were preferred against him. My time will not permit me to go over all of them, but I will give a skeleton of some of them. He was impeached in one article for failing to remove a man from office who in the judgment of the Legislature ought to have been removed. In another article he was impeached for failing to remove a man who in the judgment of the Legislature ought to have been removed.

He was impeached in another article because he called on the President of the United States for troops to put down what he believed to be domestic violence. He was impeached in another article because he leased out the penitentiary convicts to his partisan friends. The law expressly authorized him to lease them out; there was no crime at all in leasing them out; the offense was in leasing them out to his partisan friends. The inference of course is that if he had leased them out to his partisan enemies no offense would have been committed.

These were the principal charges that were preferred against him. He was impeached on these articles and driven from his office for the sole purpose of getting a democrat in his place. After the articles had been drawn up, some of the democratic members of the Legislature had some conscientious scruples on the subject. They did not desire to vote for these articles, and therefore a public pressure had to be brought to bear upon them for the purpose of whipping them into the traces.

What was done now to accomplish that? The leading democratic paper published at the capital of the State came out with flaming head-lines: "This man must be impeached and removed from office!" How? Upon the law and the evidence that may be presented? Not at all. Upon principles of equity and justice? By no means. Then how are you to get rid of him? He must be impeached and removed, said the democratic paper, "as a party measure." I defy any of my colleagues to deny that.

Mr. SINGLETON. What paper have you got there?

Mr. LYNCH. The Clarion, of Jackson, Mississippi.

Mr. SINGLETON. Produce that paper and let me see it.

Mr. LYNCH. Certainly, I will take great pleasure in doing so. This paper said that the governor must be impeached and removed from office as a party measure. No matter what the constitution may declare, no matter what the law may provide, no matter what the evidence may be, the people demand it at their hands, and they must obey the command of the people. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked, and to be careful and emphasize the words I have underscored. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

We cannot see that any lesson for our guidance in this matter of Governor Ames is to be drawn from the case of Andrew Johnson cited by The South. He was impeached for upholding the Constitution and laws. If Ames is impeached it will be for trampling them under foot. Nor does it follow that proceedings against the latter will fail because they failed in the case of the former. Johnson had justice on his side; Ames has not. Johnson was a republican President on trial before a republican Senate. Ames is a radical governor, who will be on trial before a democratic senate; and therefore no apprehensions need be felt that partisan influences will shield him from the penalty of his crimes. It is idle for the South to say that these proceedings "cannot be carried on as a party measure." They cannot be carried on in any other way.

* * * * * * *

It is no time for sentimentalism; practical work is needed. The democratic and other opposers of radical misrule "carried" the election, and if the full benefits of the victory are to be realized they will have to arraign Governor Ames and the other radical office-holders who have abused their trusts, and visit upon them the consequences of their crimes as "a party measure."

Mr. LYNCH. The South referred to in that article is a democratic paper that was opposed to impeaching the governor "as a party measure," and this article was in reply to The South.

Mr. FOSTER. And this Clarion is the official organ of the party?

Mr. LYNCH. Yes, sir; it is the official organ of the party, and its proprietors are the public printers of the State. I suppose my colleague [Mr. SINGLETON] has had some experience in the matter of public printing. Now, having demanded the impeachment of this man as a party measure, of course the articles of impeachment were put through the House, but one democrat, I believe, dissenting.

After the impeachment articles had gone through the house, it was found out that there were some conscientious democrats in the senate who were not altogether prepared to vote for conviction. So the next thing was to prepare the senate for conviction. But the only way to do that was to turn out enough republicans and put in enough democrats to make conviction sure.

They then proceeded to turn out republican senators. They turned out one man upon the ground that he was a foreigner, although he was ready to swear that he was born in New York. But it made no difference where he was born; a democratic vote was needed and they must have it. Therefore the republican was turned out and a democrat put in his place, who had not been elected even in the peculiar manner by which they carried the elections there last fall. He had not been elected, and had no right or title to the seat. Yet they turned out the republican and put in the democrat.

After having prepared the senate for conviction we are told that a committee waited on the governor. And I suppose some such conversation as this took place: "Governor, you have been impeached; your conviction is but a question of time. If you will resign your office, then you will save money to the State and some money to yourself." To that I suppose the governor replied something like this: "If I resign, will you withdraw your articles of impeachment?" Judging from the result the reply to that was, "Yes, certainly we will." And that was agreed upon

The committee went back, made their report, and the articles of impeachment were immediately withdrawn, the resignation was sent in, and the proceedings thereupon came to an end. Now, in what attitude does this place them? I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me that the democratic party in that Legislature proved itself guilty of one or two things: they either acknowledged that the charges were groundless and false, without a shadow of foundation in fact, or else they were guilty of what the lawyers would call compounding a felony. I would like any democrat to deny that. One of the two must be true. Either that Legislature was guilty of compounding a felony by allowing this man to escape as a consideration for his office, or else it was a confession on their part that he was innocent of the charges brought against him. They said: "All that we want is your office; it is immaterial to us what you may have been guilty of; the sole objective point we have in view is to get a republican out and a democrat in."

Now, in a speech of my honorable colleague, [Mr. LAMAR,] which he delivered here when some proposition relative to the impeachment of the late Secretary of War was before the House, he took the very strong ground that the object of impeachment is not merely to get rid of an objectionable officer, but to punish him besides. He did not represent his Legislature in that sentiment, for they took the position that the object of an impeachment with them is to get a republican out and a democrat in. I would like to know whether the democrats on the other side of this House from the other Southern States are willing to have the Mississippi democracy held as typical of the democracy in their States. I hope for their sakes that they are not.

THE COLOR LINE—VIOLENCE.

In referring to this question of the prevalence of violence and the drawing the color line in politics, I am willing for one to give my colleague credit for everything that he says on that point. I am willing to give him credit for sincerity in deprecating the drawing of the color line and the inauguration of brute force and violence. The only thing upon which I take issue with him in that respect is this: He believes, honestly, no doubt, that in giving utterance to conservative sentiments here and elsewhere, in deprecating the drawing of the color line and the inauguration of violence, he represents the controlling element in the ranks of the democratic party in Mississippi. I believe (and I presume he will give me credit for honesty and sincerity in this opinion) that he does not.

I am willing to admit, as I said upon a former occasion, that there are in the State of Mississippi numbers of white men who are not identified with the republican party and whom I believe to be honestly opposed to these violent measures and to drawing the color line in politics. I may be pardoned for mentioning the names of one or two of these gentlemen, because their names are somewhat national; they are known to the country. I will mention for instance the present speaker of the house of representatives of Mississippi, Hon. H. M. Street. I will also mention Hon. J. W. C. Watson, of Marshall, the editor of the paper that opposed the impeachment of the governor upon party grounds; General A. M. West, of the same town; ex-Governor Charles Clarke, and ex-Governor and ex-United States Senator Albert G. Brown, of Hinds. These men, I believe, are honestly opposed to this policy of violence and the drawing of the line in politics. I have always believed that my colleague [Mr. LAMAR] was one of that number; I am willing to give him credit for it; but when he asserts that in his conservative utterances he reflects the sentiments of the controlling element of his party, I take issue with him. His position cannot be substantiated, for it is not correct.

It is sometimes said that these violent measures are sometimes necessary to get rid of bad government, heavy taxes, and dishonest officials. I have asserted on this floor more than once that this cannot be truthfully said of Mississippi. I did not make groundless assertions and empty declarations, but presented facts and figures to substantiate what I said. Not one of my democratic colleagues has denied or can deny my position on this question. In that State there was no occasion whatever for the inauguration of violent measures on the ground that bad, incompetent, or dishonest men had control of the government.

INEFFICIENCY OF STATE GOVERNMENTS.

One other point which has been made very forcibly is the inefficiency of republican State governments at the South. It is very often said that we have violence only in the States under republican rule. Without admitting that there is any foundation for this statement, (for it is not altogether true,) I say that admitting it for the sake of argument, what does it prove? It proves that the democrats will obey the laws only when made and enforced by men of their own choice, while republicans will obey the laws whether they are made and enforced by men of their own choice or by democrats. Let us admit that violence exists only in republican localities; why is it so? Simply because democrats say, "Let us have the government and we will obey the laws; if you do not, we will not." That is precisely the argument upon which the rebellion was inaugurated.

I presume no gentleman in this Hall who is familiar with the history of our Government will deny for a moment that had Frémont been elected President instead of Buchanan in 1856, the war would have been inaugurated four years sooner than it was. And I presume no one familiar with our history will deny that had Breckinridge, or even Douglas, been elected in 1860 instead of Lincoln, the war would have been postponed at least four years later.

Did not the southern democrats say, "We will stay in the Union if you let us control it; if you do not, we will not?"

Why, sir, my colleague might just as well come before the American people and contend that the election of Tilden and Hendricks is essential to the peace of the country; he might just as well say, "Elect Tilden and Hendricks and you will have peace; elect Hayes and Wheeler and you will have war." If the argument is good as applicable to a single State, it must be equally good as applicable to the nation.

If the country is ready to accept this condition of affairs, then it can do so, but it seems to me that it would be death and destruction to what are recognized as the results of the war.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

My colleague lays great stress upon civil-service reform in the Government. That is the controlling idea, he says. Let me say to the House and the country that civil-service reform does not occupy one-twentieth part of the consideration of the southern democrats. Civil-service reform does not enter into their composition. They have not got it to think about. The sole objective point with the democratic party of the South, and I presume at the North, is democratic success. It is immaterial to them what the attitude of their candidate may be on any of the public questions now before the people. It is immaterial to them whether their candidate for the Presidency be in favor of contracting the currency or expanding it. It is immaterial to them whether he be in favor of free trade or protection. It is immaterial to them whether he be really in favor of administrative reform or whether he be, as their candidate for the Presidency is now believed to be, the earnest advocate of gigantic corporations. They are willing to subordinate all other questions to the one great object of democratic success. They are willing to subordinate all other questions, without excepting the honor, the integrity, and the plighted faith of the nation. They only ask, "Give us the democratic party; that is what we want. The sole objective point with us is to get the Government into our hands and let us get our fingers on the purse-strings of the Treasury."

They have not only drawn the color line in politics for the purpose of appealing to the passions and prejudices of race, but they have drawn the sectional line for the purpose of rolling up the southern vote in behalf of the Saint Louis nominees. Civil-service reform amounts to nothing in the estimation of the democratic party south of Mason and Dixon's line. I speak of them knowingly. It may be true of those north of it also; but I speak of those south, for I know whereof I speak. The order has already gone forth from Tammany Hall, as represented by the chiefs of that organization, saying to the democratic party of the South, "Put this party into power, elect the ticket nominated at Saint Louis, and all things else will be added unto you."

I tell you that it is the only issue in the South to-day. No other public question agitates the public mind there. You may be divided at the North on questions of currency or of administrative reform, but they do not enter into politics at the South, because the democrats do not care anything about them.

CONCLUSION.

Now, sir, let me say that the South is proposed to be carried by the democratic party. Every Southern State they propose to carry as they carried Mississippi last year; a State with 30,000 republican majority reversed by giving 30,000 democratic majority nominally. They propose to carry all the others the same way, not by the power of the ballot, but by an organized system of terrorism and violence. That is the way they propose to do it.

Now let me say, in conclusion, that I am satisfied, I am convinced, that the public sentiment of the people of this country is sufficiently aroused now to see the danger we are in. I am satisfied that the people of this country are beginning to realize the importance of the situation we are in. I am satisfied that when these questions are known, when they are fully understood, the people will be determined to rise in their might and declare in language which cannot be misunderstood that this great, grand, glorious Republic must and shall be preserved.

Mr. Speaker, it is no pleasure for me to be compelled to admit the violence which exists in my own State. I would be happy if I could say truthfully that such is not the case. It gives me no pleasure to be compelled to acknowledge perfect toleration of opinion does not exist in the State of Mississippi. I have friends there on both sides. My home is there. My interests are there. My relatives are there; and I want to see the State prosperous and happy.

I want to see perfect toleration of opinion everywhere, and especially in the State where I live. I am anxious for that to be the case, and nothing would give more pleasure than to be able to declare on the floor of the House of Representatives that perfect toleration of opinion is allowed to all classes. The fact that I am compelled to acknowledge that such is not the case in many counties in the State fills me with pain, mortification, and regret, for I want to see the two races living in harmony and in peace, and friendly relations existing between both parties. That is the object of my aspiration, and it is what I hope the better judgment of the whole body of the people of that State will see is for the general good. For I can realize the fact that since the State of Mississippi has been in its present condition of turmoil our commerce has been practically destroyed; the friendly relations between the two races arrested, emigration to the State retarded, and the State itself almost in a disorganized condition, with a lawless class controlling it to a great extent.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LYNCH. I should like to have two minutes more.

Mr. RANDALL. Better say five.

Mr. LYNCH. I do not want more than two minutes.

There being no objection, Mr. LYNCH'S time was extended.

Mr. LYNCH. In conclusion let me warn the House and the country, not with any feeling of malice, not with any feeling of hatred, for I have none, that if you expect to preserve the constitutional liberties of the people as well as to uphold the perpetuity of republican institutions you must see to it that lawlessness is crushed out at the South. I say to the northern democrats, you must see to it, with my honorable friend from New York, [Mr. LORD,] that your party stands upon the platform which that gentleman made in the resolutions introduced here yesterday to crush out mob law and violence at the South, whether proceeding from political friends or from political enemies. If the democratic party has a legitimate majority in the State of Mississippi or any other State, it is entitled to the vote of that State and ought to have it. If the republican party has a legitimate majority in that State or in any other State, it is entitled to the vote of that State and ought to have it. This is what honest men of all parties ought to be willing to say. And now, sir, I am satisfied that the people of this great Republic, realizing the necessities of the situation, will see to it that this grand and glorious Union of ours must, shall, and will be preserved. [Applause.]

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, rose.

ISSUE OF ARTIFICIAL LIMBS.

Mr. RUSK. I rise to present the report of a committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1516) to regulate the issue of artificial limbs to disabled soldiers, seamen, and others, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

The House concurs in the first and second amendments of the Senate, as follows:

In line 1 strike out "persons" and insert "officer, soldier, seaman, and marine."

In line 5, after "application," insert "or commutation therefor, as provided and limited by existing laws."

The House concurs also in the proviso added to the end of the bill with an amendment, inserting the word "not" between the words "shall" and "be" in the first line, so that it will read, "that this act shall not be subject to the proviso of an act entitled 'An act to increase pensions,' approved June 18, 1874."

J. M. RUSK,
A. V. RICE,
JOHN C. BAGBY,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
J. B. GORDON,
NEWTON BOOTH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report of the conference committee was adopted.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the conference committee was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. HALE to reconsider the vote by which the message of the President in regard to the sundry civil bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I regret that so much valuable time is being taken up with the discussion of this southern question. It is a question in which I have taken but little interest, inasmuch as the colored men have every legal right that white men have. Color is no longer known in our statutes, and I would not, Mr. Speaker, cast a single vote to deny them those rights. Since those rights have been secured to them it is strange that the time of this House is to be occupied in the discussion of this question. No man has made a move to deny them a single right or attempted to do so; but, on the contrary, a resolution was passed here yesterday declaring that this Congress was in favor of the execution of the laws and the Constitution, and parties offending should be speedily punished. I favored this resolution so as to give the colored man to understand that his liberties would not be jeopardized in the hands of either of the political parties. I consider this question settled, and should pass out of politics. Its agitation at this time is only for bad political purposes.

I desire to say to my democratic friends here that there is nothing that does us more injury in the North than the agitation of this question. Whenever there is trouble in the South it is an injury to us in the North. It is to the interest of the republican party that this difficulty should be kept up; and I notice here, Mr. Speaker, that our republican friends delight to talk about the riots of the South. By their acts it would seem that they rejoice when there is any difficulty in the South. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the blood of the colored man of the South should now be used to make political capital for the republican party of the North.

Mr. Speaker, it was not my purpose to speak at length upon this subject. I merely wanted to say to my southern friends that in every case where there is a difficulty in the South it recoils upon the democracy of the North. But there is one thing that has not been satisfactorily explained by any gentleman on this floor, and that is that those difficulties have occurred in every State of the South as long as they were under republican rule, and whenever a State of the South passes into democratic hands you hear of no more difficulty there between the white and the colored people. The trouble subsides at once. We are reliably informed that the election in Alabama passed off quietly. The trouble is now confined to Louisiana, South Carolina, and to Florida, States that are controlled by the republican party. Why is this? Why is it that the difficulties are alone in the States controlled by the republicans? Mr. Speaker, if the colored men of the South desire peace and quiet, it would seem they should desire the control of their States to pass into the hands of the democratic party. I can only acccount for this in one way; and that is, the democratic officials in the South see that the laws are executed, and that lawless men cannot impose upon colored men without being brought to the bar of justice; while in States controlled by republicans of the South they are willing to see the blood of the colored man shed to manufacture political capital for the benefit of their party in the North.

My object, Mr. Speaker, in speaking upon this occasion was not to reply to the remarks made by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LYNCH,] but to reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] on the question of the remonetization of silver. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania in a speech some days ago declared "that there never was a government that has been able to regulate the market price between the two coins, gold and silver; that it has been found to be an impossibility; that their value fluctuates as does that of any other commodity." I agree with the gentleman. I agree that a government has never been able to properly regulate the value of these coins; but I want the gentleman to think upon one question, and that is, has the Government any more power to regulate one than both? It is admitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that those metals are not standards of value; but the different nations having adopted them as money and fixed a value on them in payment of honest debts, has done much to give them uniform value.

I maintain that it is far more practicable to regulate the value of both than of one. If you have two metals performing the same office, whenever there is a demand for one of them or there is a scarcity of one of them by the demands from foreign countries, the other will perform the office of the one in demand. A double standard is self-regulating, while if you have but one standard, what is there to regulate it? If we had but one standard in this country, and a demand was made on us for the metal out of which it was made, there is nothing to check the advance in price of that metal, but if we have two each serves as a substitute for the other, and as a check in the advance of the other, and brings about a uniform value. The gentleman says that "you can no more regulate the price of coin metal than of grain." I admit the proposition, but I ask the gentleman whether the value of grain is not better regulated when there are two kinds of grain to perform the same office than it would be if you had but one; for instance, you have two kinds of grain which are used for breadstuffs. If the crop of one is short the other takes its place, and extravagant prices are prevented. It is just so with metals; wheat and corn regulate the value of each other, and so it is with gold and silver; they regulate the value of each other also.

The gentleman says that "if you remonetize silver and receive it for tariff dues then the Government will be compelled to buy gold to pay the interest on the public debt." I want the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] to understand that the same law that defines what shall be received for tariff dues defines what shall be received for the interest on the public debt. Tariff dues are to be paid in coin and the interest on the public debt is to be paid in coin. We have as much right to pay the interest on our public debt in silver as we have to take silver coin for tariff dues. I claim the right in both instances.

The gentleman then speaks of "the great fraud," as he terms it, that would be perpetrated on the creditor class provided we remonetize silver and offer it in payment of our bonds. I say that the action of the Government in demonetizing silver was a course that would be discountenanced on any stock-board in the United States. The Government sold coin "short;" it sold that which it did not have for future delivery at the time. Let me suggest an illustration to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Suppose a stock company, say the "Pacific Mail," had one thousand shares of stock, and they would sell "short" with that understanding, and a portion of their stockholders would be purchasers, say to the extent of five hundred shares. The directors would then consolidate the stock, retiring one-half, thus increasing the value of the stocks one-half; and at the time of delivery, suppose the corporation was compelled to purchase the stock, thus increased in value as stated by the retirement of the one-half, would not that be a great fraud on all stockholders not purchasers, and would not it bankrupt the company for the benefit of the few purchasers of stock? What would be said of this board of directors? Would they be countenanced on any stock-board in the country?

That is what the United States has done. It sold coin short and then retired one-half of its coin. A greater fraud was never perpetrated upon any stock-board, and yet men who engaged in this kind of legislation, this kind of fraud against all the debtors of the country, come here, and in this Congress, and when men speak in behalf of the right, they abuse and denounce them. Some time hence it will be remembered that when I offered an amendment to a bill to make silver a full legal tender it was denounced in a most violent speech. I want gentlemen to understand that they have a different party to deal with now and that the creditors of the country are going to be heard, and instead of meeting them with derision let them come forward with their argument. They will find that before this question is settled no denunciation will prevent an entire investigation of this matter. They will find that they will be compelled to come forward with argument rather than denunciation. If they have no argument, let them keep quiet.

When this question was first before the House the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] took especial pains to denounce those who brought it forward. I want to say in regard to him that I have kindly feelings toward him—I do not entertain unkind feelings toward any gentleman on this floor—but when I read his remarks in the RECORD made in regard to this great measure of restoring silver and giving it a legal-tender quality, a great measure in the interest of the people as against a few moneyed corporations and the bondholders of the country; when I saw the manner in which this question was treated by him, I felt it due to me and to the people I represent and to the one hundred and ten Representatives who cast their votes for that measure that he should be replied to before this session closes.

I am now satisfied that this subject is not to be settled this session. I am satisfied that the bondholding interest here will filibuster this measure over to the next session. But I want those gentlemen to understand that this question is only put off. The people will settle the matter between now and the next meeting of Congress, and I venture to say that at a very early day in the next session this measure will be carried by a large majority. We propose to establish in this country the right of the people, not by taking from any individual or class of men any rights that belong to them, but to take from them rights which they have unlawfully taken from others and restore them to whom they belong.

I desire now to refer to some remarks made by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in his speech upon this subject some time since.

Mr. Speaker, I quote from the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD:] "In 1873 we adopted a device to preserve the constancy of the value of the dollar." If the gentleman had omitted the de, and said we adopted a vice, he would have fairly expressed the law of 1873, for no more vicious legislation was ever before devised and enacted. It was not done, as the gentleman says, to "preserve the dollar," but to destroy it. It was not done, as the gentleman says, "because Congress saw that it would be difficult to preserve the dollar," but because a set of men congregated on Wall street (calling themselves brokers, and properly so, because they break everybody with whom they come in contact) saw that without such legislative action their business of gambling would be gone; therefore they sought to impose upon such members of Congress as the honorable gentleman from Ohio, and humbugged him and others into this most villainous legislation. In all of my career in both private and public life I have never known any proposition containing so many of the "essential elements of rascality and colossal swindling" as this demonetizing act of 1873.

The honorable gentleman from Ohio introduced the subject of equivalents from the law of 1869; it is manifest that he is not as ignorant upon that subject as upon the act demonetizing silver, at least he was wise enough to stop reading from that act just at the point which allowed him to place his own construction on it, a construction, I will venture to assert, few other members of this House could be found to indorse. The sentence which he refused to read explained the meaning of the words "coin and equivalent;" coin meant gold and silver and the equivalent their equivalent.

But the gentleman was wise enough to have the whole sentence printed in the RECORD when detected in his effort at special pleading upon the topic of equivalency. The truth is the gentleman has by his own presentation of this question destroyed his whole argument. He says "he denies the principle of equivalency." Who proposes to pay in this silver coin? It is he who "denies the principle of equivalency," for the law says gold and silver coin, which means either of them. The equivalency attaches to paper if offered in payment, and not to either of the metals. This is the plain construction of the law, and he is the first to give to the law any other interpretation and should be the last to thus interpret it. It is too absurd to be again repeated.

The gentleman from Ohio said, some one has said, "that there is an innate desire in the human mind to get a chance to cheat somebody." If this House desires proof of the honorable gentleman's quotation, I would refer you to his efforts in securing the passage of the law of 1873, demonetizing silver. This act deprives all the debtor class of this country of the option of offering silver in payment. That option to-day would be worth more than $1,000,000 to the debtor class. This was no small "cheat."

And it appears the gentleman was not entirely ignorant of the effect of this act, for he says, "that Congress foresaw a difficulty ahead (he was in Congress at the time) and passed a law to guard against it."

This difficulty was just what we now seek to remedy; the cheapening of silver was foreseen. How was it foreseen? Was it not by the intercourse of the plotting bondholders of both continents with legislation that the action of speculators was foreseen?

The great wisdom of the eminent statesman from Ohio would seem to have been formed upon information of the action of a body of Shylocks, who, not content with their "pound" of "flesh," must take the "blood" also. They well knew that it was the right of the debtor to pay in the cheapest money; hence the law must be changed by demonetizing silver to deprive them of that right, as it was likely to be cheap because of the conspiracy against it, which, if not demonetized, the creditor would be compelled to take it. The gentleman from Ohio boasts of participating in this conspiracy against the debtor class by legislative enactment in changing the contract, repudiating the original.

Again I quote from the gentleman from Ohio:

> A great minister once said that there were two things in human nature which when united always made iniquity complete. One was the desire to do a dishonorable thing and the other was the opportunity to do it.

It was most unfortunate that the opportunity was presented to the honorable gentleman from Ohio in 1873, and it is more to be regretted that the opportunity found him filled with the desire.

Mr. Speaker, can you picture in your mind the warm greeting that Representatives of the people met with at the festive board of the scheming bondholders, after having sold out the rights of their constituents, or rather legislated them away? Many healths were no doubt drank to the honorable gentleman from Ohio for his great liberality and generosity in seeing that they were to be paid in "honest money," seeing as they did that silver was soon to become dishonest money, as dishonest legislation had been enacted against it. The bondholders and gold-brokers no doubt exclaimed, "Gold will now advance, and we will receive our pay in it, and all this due to the generosity of the gentleman from Ohio and others. Drink them down!" O, there was no solemnity there.

If we are to be lectured upon the high moral grounds taken by the honorable gentleman, I hope it will be done by some one who was not the advocate of every measure that has been concocted in this House for the past ten years to filch from and rob the people, and still champion such jobs as "solemn pledges."

Mr. Speaker, there are but few members here who supported the iniquitous legislation of 1869, which increased the obligations of the debtor class by changing the payment from paper to coin, more than $400,000,000 on the public debt alone. The fraud of 1873 demonetizing silver affects all debts, public and private, and is far more reaching in its effect. The Government debt is but little over two billions, while State, municipal, and individual debts amount to more than ten billion. It ill becomes that few to lecture this House or at this time to stand by those fraudulent acts on "moral" grounds.

Some weeks ago a resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POPPLETON] asking that a committee of investigation be appointed and charging that corrupt means were resorted to to pass the act of 1869, and that no less than $5,000,000 had been paid out to secure the "solemn pledge" spoken of by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and if I mistake not the honorable gentleman opposed the passage of that resolution.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Will my friend from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the act of 1873 retired one-half of the coin of this country?

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I was illustrating a case. I say that, according to the best information we have, silver constitutes about one-half of the world's money. Our silver bullion is much greater than our gold bullion, at least twice as great.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman inform me how much has been coined by our Mint during its existence of gold and silver?

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I know that that is a point taken by some gentlemen. I know that they urge that only about eight million silver dollars have been coined.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. That is so.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I understand that very well. But I wish to say that this country, until latterly, was not a silver-producing country. During the first years of the existence of this Government we obtained our silver from other countries. Now we are a great silver-producing country. In 1873 this Congress sought to undervalue its own production.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I want to remind the gentleman of the fact that from the organization of the Mint up to 1873, when this act was passed, the coinage of gold amounted to $816,000,000, while the coinage of silver was only about $145,000,000. Consequently if silver was demonetized by the act of 1873, it constituted but a small proportion of the metallic currency of this country.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Will the gentleman also inform the House that in the early days of the Republic we had an immense amount of silver coin that was of Spanish and Mexican coinage, and that silver was worth more than gold. We had but little bullion to coin ourselves.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I know that for the first few years we had not. But we began to coin the silver dollar in 1849, and from that time we had our own silver dollar, and the number of silver dollars coined at our mints amounts to only about $8,000,000. I desire to ask the gentleman another question. He contends that the word "coin" in the act of 1869 includes both gold and silver. I want to inquire of him whether it includes copper and nickel, and whether or not he would contend that the interest on the public debt could be paid in subsidiary silver coin and in coppers and nickels?

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I will give the gentleman the interpretation of the word coin as made by Chief Justice Chase. In deciding a case that came from New York to the Supreme Court Chief Justice Chase said that we had two kinds of dollars; that we had the coin dollar composed of a piece of gold or silver of a certain degree of weight and fineness, and a paper dollar. Is that satisfactory to the gentleman?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I know that. But I want to know if the gentleman goes further and contends that the nickels and coppers, which are also coin, should be receivable in payment of public dues?

Mr. FORT. To the extent that they are legal tender, of course they should be.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. The gentleman will understand that coppers and nickels are not known in the Constitution at all, and are not coins as defined in the Constitution. It is merely trifling with this question to raise that point.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise for the purpose of submitting a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the legislative, judicial, and executive appropriation bill.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. RANDALL. If it does not take too much time.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill No. 3628 establishing post-roads, with the Senate amendments thereto, and to have them referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. As the amendments of the Senate contain an appropriation, we propose to confer with the Committee on Appropriations on that subject.

No objection was made; and the bill, with the Senate amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill and amendments were referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk for consideration at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the annual reports of the Postmaster-General, as required by section 413 of the Revised Statutes, together with the accompanying documents in relation to contracts for carrying the mails, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, be printed.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. The papers referred to in this resolution were some time ago referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and are now in the committee-room.

Mr. KASSON. They have not yet been printed?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. They have not been, and this resolution is to direct their printing.

No objection was made; and the resolution was adopted.

PUBLICATION OF ARMY REGULATIONS.

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.]

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution No. 24, providing for the postponement of the publication of the Army regulations, be taken from the Speaker's table and acted on now.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the President was, by act of Congress approved March 1, 1875, authorized to make and publish regulations for the government of the Army in accordance with existing laws; and whereas by act of Congress approved July 24, 1876, a commission was created, to which has been referred the whole subject-matter of reform and re-organization of the Army of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the President be requested to postpone all action in connection with the publication of said regulations until after the report of said commission is received and acted on by Congress at its next session.

Mr. BANNING. It is thought by those in charge of the publication of these regulations that inasmuch as the commission on the re-organization of the Army will report at the next session of Congress, it will be best to postpone until that time the publication of the Army Regulations, as that report may make changes in those regulations.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MAISH, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have published in the RECORD remarks on Pennsylvania border claims. [See Appendix.]

IMPEACHMENT OF WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Mr. MCMAHON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4090) to publish the proceedings in the impeachment of William W. Belknap; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

REMOVAL OF DISTRICT JAIL.

Mr. HOLMAN. In order that the conference asked by the Senate may be agreed to, I ask the House to take up the bill (S. No. 842) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to remove the jail on Judiciary Square to grounds near the Washington Asylum, for the use of the District. This is a local affair. I move that the House insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. YOUNG, and Mr. KIMBALL as the conferees on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1089) granting a pension to Thomas I. Fox, late a private of Company C, Fifty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 3359) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 3374) for the relief of Harry E. Eastman, late lieutenant-colonel Second Regiment Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 3678) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Lydia to that of Sylph; and

An act (H. R. No. 3849) for the relief of James W. Harvey and James Livesey, of the firm of Harvey & Livesey, of Wisconsin.

Mr. POPPLETON, from the same committee, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (S. No. 846) to punish the counterfeiting of trade-mark goods and the sale or dealing in of counterfeit trade-mark goods;

An act (S. No. 852) for the relief of Elisha E. Rice;

An act (S. No. 944) for the relief of Gilderoy M. Hardy;

An act (S. No. 990) to remove the political disabilities of Reuben Davis, of Mississippi;

An act (S. No. 1021) allowing the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails in their new iron steam-ships;

An act (S. No. 1036) to provide for the printing and distribution of the reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the years 1874 and 1875;

An act (H. R. No. 1713) for the relief of Berthold Loewenthal, of Chicago, Illinois;

An act (H. R. No. 2271) to increase the pension of Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner; and

An act (H. R. No. 3209) to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to receive lands in payment of judgments to eastern band of Cherokee Indians.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit the report which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 70, 72, 73, 76, 175, 177, 178, 181, 182, 205, 215, 419, 443, 444, 445, 446, 460, 519, 545, 553, 554, 559, 577, 581, 590, 591, 592, 593, 614, 617, 620, 623, 625, 632, 643, 708, 709, 710, 721, 722, 763, 764, 766, 776, 810 812, 912, 915, 921, 922, and 944.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28. 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59. 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 68, 69, 71, 78, 79, 80, 138,139,140, 141, 142, 143, 157, 159, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 169, 170, 171, 172, 179, 180, 213, 214, 418, 422, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 430, 450, 457, 458, 461, 468, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 503, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 518, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 550, 552, 555, 556, 558, 560, 561, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 589, 594, 609, 610, 616, 619, 631, 644, 652, 654, 655, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702. 703, 704, 706, 707, 711, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721,, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 759, 761, 762, 765, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 807, 809, 811, 842, 913, 914, 917, 918, 919, 920, 936, 937, 938, 940, 941, and 942.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 1, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: After the word "appropriated," where it occurs the second time in the enacting clause of the bill, insert "in full compensation;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 21, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out, in line 10, page 2 of the bill, the words "two hundred and twenty" and insert in lieu thereof "five hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 51, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: After the word session, in line 6, page 3 of the bill, insert ("which words 'during the session' as used in this act shall be held to mean four months;") and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 52, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "four thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "two thousand eight hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 53, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "sixty-six thousand nine hundred and twenty-two" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "seventy thousand eight hundred and two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 66, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "thirteen," and insert in lieu thereof "thirty-seven;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 67, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "twenty-eight," and insert "fifty-two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 74, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out therefrom the word "four" and insert "one;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 75, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "eight" and insert "six;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 77, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "forty-eight thousand and four" and insert in lieu thereof "thirty-three thousand and seven; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 81 to 136, both inclusive, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:
